We trust that Mrs. Stanton will believe us actuated by the friendliest spirit, both to herself and the cause she so ably serves, when we say that we deeply regret the tone of her allusions to the Fifteenth Amendment,—certainly the sublimest "moral measure" yet carried out successfully in the history of man. There is not a generous-minded voter in America who is not repelled by such a mistaken way of advocating woman suffrage. The one unanswerable argument for woman suffrage is the principle that suffrage belongs of right to the whole people, and that women are a part of the whole people. But the negroes are as truly a part of the people as women. To sneer at negro suffrage, is to sneer at woman suffrage. The friends of woman cannot afford such a sneer. It hurts their cause more than they can possibly imagine. On grounds of policy alone, such advocacy of woman suffrage is disastrously ill-judged. On grounds of principle, it is worse. A cause which appeals to justice must not stoop to injustice. If the woman movement creates in the minds of its advocates any feeling which would even for a time withhold the suffrage from the negro, it sinks to the level of a mere selfish scramble for power. Its influence should be to increase the love of justice, to create joy at every triumph of human rights, to identify all private interests with the universal welfare of mankind. "The man who denies a woman's right to vote," says Henry B. Blackwell, "can show no title to his own." True. And the woman who denies a negro's right to vote can show no title to her own.

What we have said is prompted by the sincerest good-will to Mrs. Stanton, whom we lately had the pleasure to meet, to hear and to admire. The more we read The Revolution, the more we like it. It is bold, interesting, spicy, and conducted with great ability; and if we have criticised it in one point, we could praise it in a hundred points. Nothing but a wish to put the woman movement on such a basis that only the prejudiced, the unjust, and the selfish can possibly oppose it, has overcome our unwillingness to say a single word of criticism. Let us all remember that a noble cause must be nobly served, with a frank confidence in its principles and a grand disdain of small jealousies and unworthy expedients. It is the worst possible policy for a struggling reform to enlist against itself the generous instincts of mankind.

THE PROBLEM OF IMMORTALITY.

DETROIT, April 18, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—In THE INDEX of the 9th inst., in your comments on an article upon Immortality, you make a statement on which I have since thought much, and which I have turned over many times.

The proposition is fundamental and involves much, if true; and since there seems to be a question on this point, I venture the following queries:—

You say—"If best for us to live again, we shall live again; if otherwise, we do not even desire it."

Amen to the first—but how about the second? Is this last refinement of submission possible? Can a soul acquiesce in its own annihilation?

I know that that serenity which faces whatever is with utter trust and calm is the true condition, yet is, I think, consistent only with an indestructible soul,—not perhaps provable by logic, but superior to logic, and serene where logic fails to find any ground for serenity.

Great and pure souls have, I think, often arrived at this calm with not only no direct aid from the intellect, but apparently in opposition to its reasoning.

From this I do not conclude that the soul can accept calmly its possible destruction, but that it is so much greater than its argument that it is undisturbed by it,—just as many of the dogmas professedly believed by sectarians to day (believed to be believed) would, if really believed, change wholly the tenor of their lives; yet they live on sanely enough, moving with the general order, because "built" so much "better than they know."

The chance for a mistake in this question of the soul's power to accept calmly such a doom is the greater because we have in life no parallel experience.

All seeming self-denials prove, in the last analysis, no denying of self at all, but a conserving of the highest self.

So that a requisite of every act of virtue seems to be that it shall pay, neither does this degrade, but rather makes sane what would not be without it. It articulates what would otherwise be broken. It renders the conception of harmony possible. How can there be compensation for annihilation—compensation to me?

Perhaps I am raising old issues, and am in danger of running into ruts too deeply worn already; yet I think there are words worth saying, and not yet said even here, and you who are so wholly a champion of reason will be willing that for the highest flight of virtue a reason be asked.

To accept with unshadowed trust and joy the "changeless order of the universe" is well every way—must be well. Yet to give up all save rectitude of living, retaining this to the uttermost and at all expense, is, after all, retaining more a thousand-fold than we give up, and is for the soul more profitable than the most calculating selfishness could be.

So in every investigation we make we find the "changeless order" to be, that the highest is the best,—not the best abstractly, not the best for some coming generation or race, but the best for us. Thus man, judging from his experience, may well be "master of his soul, happen what may," but this would seem reasonable only on the supposition that the soul is superior to whatever may happen, which would not be the case in the event of annihilation happening.

Again. Why should I have faith in a Power that annihilates me? If virtue brings me to this, how is it virtue to me?

Yours, &c.,

L. T. I.

Without attempting a reply to all its thoughtful suggestions, we offer merely a few words on the general subject.

Unless the future existence for which we think all earnest men and women must at least hope, shall offer higher conditions and larger opportunities than the present, we express only our own feeling in saying that it does not seem intrinsically desirable. Knowing nothing on this point, we covet continuance of being if, and only if, such conditions and opportunities are possible. The necessary unattainability of ideal perfection in this life is, in our opinion, the most solid ground of hope for a larger life hereafter. If ideal perfection can be attained under possible conditions and opportunities of a higher kind in another life, we think our hope will not be disappointed. If on the contrary such conditions and opportunities are impossible, we see no reason to accuse the Power to which we owe our being for not eternally prolonging it. For we do not believe that impossibilities are possible. Who is wise enough to unveil all the secrets of Nature?

Whether the soul lives after the body dies, is purely a question of fact. Our doubt will not make it mortal,—our belief will not make it immortal. Thought changes no reality. To us this great question of fact is unanswered still. Unwilling to put desire in place of reason and thus hoodwink our own soul, we have chosen rather to look the problem calmly in the face, and emancipate ourselves from the power of possibilities. So long as the bare thought of annihilation paralyzes us, just so long is our peace dependent on our certainty of immortality. A doubt alone will be enough to wreck our tranquillity and derange our life. Frankly, we cannot afford thus to be the slave of a suspicion. We must rise above this dependence and crippling terror into a higher atmosphere. In the conviction that virtue is an absolute good, we find enough to sweeten life as it comes, and to steal the sting from death. True, virtue must "pay,"—but it pays for itself. We can no more render a reason why virtue is virtue, than why beauty is beauty. These are ultimate facts. If we cannot be virtuous without the bribe of immortality, we are not virtuous at all, but serve for hire. It is shrewdness, not virtue, which looks for a reward. With profoundest conviction we affirm that no one is really fitted to discuss the great problem of human destiny, who can not forget his own wishes in the single-minded love of truth,—who is not less anxious to make the fact than to find it. The inward pre-determination to believe only a certain conclusion, utterly disqualifies us for honest or unwarped thinking. Until we are willing to live for unselfish, virtuous, and beneficent character, in oblivion of ulterior rewards, we remain unworthy of the immortality to which we aspire. That this supreme devotion to ideal spiritual beauty is possible, untainted by any coveting of compensation, we do indeed believe; and it sheds such a glory over life that, unafraid even by the thought of extinction, the human soul shines superior to all contingencies. There is nothing noble in mere continuance. An old stump outlasts many generations of field-flowers; but we would rather be the flower than the stump. Its beauty is its superiority.

Let us not be misunderstood. We hope as earnestly for immortality as the most undoubting; but we refuse as resolutely to be the thrall of hope as of fear. The main question is how to live,—not how long.—Ed.]

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT AND THE WAR.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Friend,—In THE INDEX of the 9th instant you make reference to the official proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment. It is fitting that it should be recognized and rejoiced in, for it marks a significant step in the education and advance of our people towards the broad ground of universal justice and equality. It does not discharge to the full our obligations to the black man; we are far removed, indefinitely below that yet; it is a fair, albeit very tardy, beginning.

But is it quite in accordance with the truth of history to make this act the crown of the purposes that entered into the late war? You say it "marks the complete victory of the ideas for which the war was waged." There were those, doubtless, not a large class and not occupying official or in any way nationally representative position, who engaged in the war under that inspiration, who saw (as they thought) a purpose behind the purpose, and entered the army and fought, or actively advocated the conflict, in the hope and expectation that emancipation would eventuate in or be necessitated by it.

But so far as the nation at large is concerned, the war was undertaken and prosecuted, if I at all understand it, for far different ends to those you describe. The government, the press throughout (that very large portion of it standing by and speaking for the government), the organs of the sentiment and purpose of the nation, of whatever kind, declared emphatically and from the beginning to the end, that it was a war for the Union,—for that absolutely and solely. The issue taken with the South was not that they were guilty of enslaving, but guilty of rebellious—of treason in casting off their allegiance to the American Union. To maintain that Union inviolate and put down the rebellion, to quench the treason of secession, men were summoned to arms, and the immense expenditure in blood and treasure that was made was welcome. There is nothing plainer, so far as I know, among all the facts of history than this, repeated and insisted upon constantly, and in the most universal manner, on the part of people and government, and frankly admitted by warm anti-slavery men, who were committed to the war, as for instance Charles Sumner and Gerrit Smith.

Slavery was described as a thing thoroughly subordinate and incidental, nowise involved in the primal issue, to be ignored or recognized and taken advantage of, as national exigencies might require. You will remember the memorable letter of Pres. Lincoln to Mr. Greeley, in which he declares it as his sovereign business, the whole duty of man so far as he is concerned, to vindicate and maintain the Union, his resolve in accordance thereto to act or refrain from acting against slavery, as the interests of the Union may require. I do not know that he ever repented of the unfaithfulness, or changed attitude essentially in this regard to the end of his life. Certainly in his last public effort, a speech that we have from him on the evening of April 11th, 1865, very shortly before his assassination, he announces the same view of his mission and the design of the war, advocates the acceptance of the Louisiana constitution and government with its injustice to the colored men, and, instead of owning with shame the wrong and pledging himself to seek, so far as in him lay, its removal, counsels those men with grace to accept the situation, arguing that the fittest and surest method of gaining a desired end of right is to acquiesce for the time in the present condition, the existing partiality and wrong. It is characteristically the speech of a trimmer, one who breathes the air of compromise.

I owe no ill-will, have no unkind word for Mr. Lincoln. I would think as leniently as I may of his short-comings and sins, and appreciate at their worth the finer personal qualities of which he was undeniably possessed. But he stood representatively, was the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and his attitude and utterance regarding the war are significant. They voice the sentiments and purposes of the American people.

Alas, no! The war was not waged for "those ideas," and that was the condemnation. Would that it had been! They would have gone far to sanctify the war, to lift it from the character of a paltry partisan strife for political jurisdiction (and it becomes that the moment the elemental rights of man are thrown out of the account), to a sublime struggle for humanity. It would have been of the same kind as the deed of John Brown at Harper's Ferry, a piece of work done for the rights of human nature. Defeat in such a cause would have been victory. But as a people we failed to read the lesson, and the record remains.

There has been here, as in many other instances, disappointment and surprise; there has been design of Heaven transcending and counterworking the designs of men, granting us not what we would, but what we ought and must. There has been stern tuition, terrible lessons written in and through the war, never to be forgotten. Among the fruits is this amendment, to be rejoiced in as the commenced return, we will hope, to sobriety and a true obedience; more, much more remains, and must yet come. But let us hold firm to the truth of history, claim nothing for ourselves to which we are not entitled. Let us beware of glorifying the war for what, not contemplated, sought or designed in it, has but incidentally grown out of it. The war meant the maintenance intact of a political organization; the upper powers meant freedom and justice for man. The first is not yet assured, the latter is in a fair way of approximate realization.

CHAS. D. B. MILLS.

Syracuse, N. Y., April 16, 1870.

[It was what Mr. Mills so finely characterizes as "a purpose behind the purpose" that we had in mind in our few words on the Fifteenth Amendment, which were dictated to an amanuensis in a transient illness, and therefore failed to express our meaning as adequately as we could wish. It is perfectly true that the war was not consciously waged for the ideas which find their realization in the Fifteenth Amendment. But the chief actors in revolutions seldom comprehend the moral forces of which they are little more than the puppets. It was ideas, not Presidents or Generals, that in truth waged the war against slavery; and it is ideas that have triumphed at last. Mr. Mill's criticisms of the administration and people are just; and we sympathize fully with them. The Emancipation Proclamation itself, boasted of and magnified as it has been, was shorn of all moral grandeur by its lack of universality, and we were at the time even more mortified and disappointed by this lack than thrilled by the freedom gained. Mr. Lincoln tarnished by his timidity the most golden hour of history. Nor is the American people as a whole entitled to much moral credit for the abolition of slavery. There is neither heroism nor beauty in succumbing to a "military necessity." Nevertheless, there were many braver and truer souls among the people than those who ostensibly led; and we cannot accurately estimate the amount of the influence they exerted. It was a moral necessity that created the military necessity. We fail to read history aright, unless we discern the power of ideas behind and beneath the human machinery through which they act. Their unconscious outnumber their conscious servants a thousand to one. None the less are they omnipotent and supreme. What more mightily commands faith in Nature and natural laws as grounded in Moral Intelligence, than this slow yet fated triumph of moral ideas over all tyrannies and stupidities in the development of human society? The Power that ordains this involuntary moral progress of man is self-demonstrated God.—ED.]

FROM THE SOUTH-WEST.

[We have been requested to publish the following letter.—ED.]

FORT BLISS, Texas, March 12, 1870.

MR. A. COCHRANE, Franklin, Pa.

DEAR SIR,—I am "a long way from Chicago," as we say out west. If you cast your eye on the map and find El Paso, you will see where I am. Fort Bliss is on the east bank of the Rio Grande, and I am at this instant looking over the boundary of Uncle Sam's farm at the mud houses and ditches of the ancient town of El Paso, in Mexico. I came 815 miles in a stage, nearly one half of the way in an open buggy, without stopping. It was a hard trip and also very dangerous on account of the Comanche and Apache Indians. We had several alarms in the night, and twice unlimbered our Winchester 16-shooter, but put it up again, as the Indians thought discretion the better part of valor. I received THE INDEX by the same mail. I thank you for it, and hail it as a standard-bearer of "the free." I issued my personal declaration of independence fourteen or fifteen years ago, and have maintained it ever since, but have felt at times very lonely. Man wants and needs, from the very nature of his organization, the stimulus and solace of brotherhood. The old Theology gives it only in the most selfish and restricted sense. God speed all honest souls who wheel into line, and march under the banner of the fearless and the free, "recognizing no master but God, accepting no creed but Truth." The army is increasing, and in time it will overturn all the citadels of error, and the grand temple of universal truth, in which the whole earth shall worship, will be erected on everlasting foundations.

I am in a strange country, on a low alluvium 3600 feet above sea-level, surrounded by bare, rugged, volcanic mountains, which are tilted toward the southwest and show the earth's crust for several thousand feet. The base of the mountains is about two and a half miles off. I am going to the summit in a few days, prospecting and geologizing.

Truly yours,

E. H. BOWMAN.

THE GALLOWES.

I am glad to see that somebody is alive to the death penalty, the worst relic of barbarism that remains upon the statute books of nations. To kill in order to prevent murder is a contradiction in terms.

The Spiritualists have a doctrine or theory that the spirits of those who go return to visit those most like themselves,—the good to those they loved, and the bad to the bad. I don't pretend to fathom the notions of that sect; but this I have observed. When one suicide takes place, another follows the same week; and after a gallows-exhibition there are plenty of murders. So far, at least, there seems truth in their theory. But I suppose a morbid state of mind is operated upon by the dying speeches and confessions; and to get clear of it, some take their own lives, and others invite the hangman to put an end to theirs.

NOT QUITE SO FAST.

ОМАHA, April 16, 1870.

MR. EDITOR:—One of your correspondents thinks it necessary to overthrow the inspiration of the Bible. I deem not. Inspiration is a spiritual impression on the mind which, according to the Bible, may be either right or wrong.

An angel from heaven was sent to inspire the prophets of Ahab (or Baal) to predict his success, which caused his overthrow. Joseph was inspired in a dream to carry the child to Egypt. Miracles are no proof of the truth of testimony. The Egyptians made serpents; so did Moses. Simon Magus cast out devils; so did Paul. No uninspired man is, or ever was, a real Christian, Mohammedan, Swedenborgian, Mormon, or Shaker. All these and all other such systems are sustained by the power of inspiration. The Bible says that no man can call Jesus God but by the Holy Ghost. What we want is reason, to sift the chaff from the wheat.

P. FORBES.

The Montana Democrat tells of one of their ministers preaching from the text, "God created man in His own image." Then he commenced, "An honest man is the noblest work of God." Pausing, he looked over the audience and said: "But I opine God Almighty has not had a job in this city for nigh onto fifteen years."

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICAL WORK.

In an article in this department of THE INDEX for March 19, was this sentence:—"And Free Religion, whenever it comes to its practical application and work, will most surely have a definite basis and aim." The sentence has been quoted in some quarters as pointing to a statement of belief; and a few persons—we fear they cannot be entirely friendly to the Association—have been ready to cry, "So the Free Religious Association is to have a creed!" We ask all such persons to read and fairly interpret the whole article before they inquire for the forthcoming creed! As to the particular sentence in question, we have not the original manuscript to refer to, but we think that wherever stood in the copy instead of whenever. At any rate the former is what we should prefer to say; not that there is any very great difference,—except that the sentence as printed would seem to imply that free religious principles are not already practically at work. We think that they are. We think that wherever they take thorough root in any individual, or in any number of individuals, they will show themselves in practical life and work; in life that will have very definite principles, in work that will know its aim. For instance, a local religious society in Florence, Mass., has been in existence for several years, which is established on essentially the same general principles as those which underlie the Free Religious Association in its larger field. And that is a very live society. It has established a Hall for Sunday services, with a free Library and Reading-room attached. It has meetings for free discussion among the members on all the vital questions of the day. It is busy in various good works of charity and reform. It is not only a religious but a social and humanitarian society also. And it is emphatically a society of the people, drawing rich and poor, the capitalist and the laborer, the cultivated and the ignorant, the believer and the skeptic, together to help each other. Now here "Free Religion" has come, in one form, to its practical application and work. Again, in Toledo, the very persons who have been most earnest in establishing the "independent" religious society, have been devoting themselves to carrying on an Industrial School for teaching poor girls to sew, and have set up an Evening School for boys and young men who are working during the day; and are alive to all good works for the elevation of mankind. They are not simply speculative, but their principles work directly into practice. True, people of the various sects are doing this kind of work, too. But then it is plain that a vast deal of the energy of the sects has to be spent in defending their lines and in upholding their dogmas. This power, the Free Religious Association claims, should be emancipated to be applied directly to this work of social amelioration and construction. And to set forth this idea was the special purpose of the article to which we have referred. The Free Religious Association most certainly has principles, aims, objects; if, not, there were no reason for its existence; and these are embodied in its Constitution; and it expects that these principles, wherever and whenever accepted, will somehow appear in the practical life of individuals and of society. But for effecting these practical ends, which must necessarily vary with change of time and according to locality and circumstances, it does not institute any fixed methods or machinery. It aims to extend principles, and then leaves them to crystallize naturally into organization according to the specific use for which their application is anywhere needed.

RELIGION AND MUSIC.

Mr. John S. Dwight, in his Horticultural Hall lecture, in Boston, is reported to have used the following language in regard to the relation between the freedom of true religion and the freedom of the highest music:—

"Religion refuses to be questioned; no one has a right to catechise it, or compel it to wear a badge. Religion and authority are radical contradictions. If religion be not free, it must be more or less a sham. Nevertheless, religion longs for expression, and it is best expressed by music. Music is the natural language of the religious sentiment; it has no acquaintance with doubt or unbelief; it has no negations; all its forms are positive; it cannot be sectarian; it respects the privacy of every soul; it cannot be gross or corrupting."

The best thing in the first number of the new comic paper, Punchinello, is this: "Let Stone of the Journal of Commerce, Wood of the News, Marble of the World, and Brick of the Democrat put their heads together, and make a new conglomerate pavement."

"You must admit, doctor," said a lady to a celebrated Doctor of Divinity, with whom she was arguing the question of the equality of the sexes—"you must admit that woman was created before man." "Well, really, madam," said the astonished divine, "I must ask you to prove your case." "That can be easily done, sir," she naively replied; "wasn't Eve the first maid?"

"Religious missions," said Horace Smith once, "are an attempt to produce in distant and unenlightened nations a uniformity of opinion on subjects upon which the missionaries themselves are at fierce and utter variance, thus submitting a European controversy of eighteen hundred years to the decision of a synod of savages."

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.

To the Friends of Free Thought, Free Speech, and a Free Press:

The Boston Investigator.
VOLUME XL.

Truth, Perseverance, Union, Justice, the Means; Happiness, the End; Hear all Sides, then Decide.

The Fortieth Volume of the BOSTON INVESTIGATOR will commence on the 4th of May, 1870, and, as heretofore, it will be devoted to the development and promotion of Universal Mental Liberty. To the maintenance of this great principle, without which we cannot possess and extend that genuine and untrammelled Free Inquiry which is the direct road to Truth, the INVESTIGATOR will continue, as formerly, to lend its undivided and constant support. The field it occupies in the domain of thought and action, though deemed a dangerous one by its opponents, is yet to us a realm which contains all the facts of Nature and Reason; and under the inspiring influence of this true and healthful Philosophy, we have all the incentive we need to go forward with our publication. We are thoroughly satisfied with the Liberal or Infidel principles we maintain, believing that they lead to Truth, and promote in every rational and practical way the best interests of Humanity in this world. We deal with facts, not fiction—with earth, not heaven; and wish to substitute for the vagaries of eternity and faith the substantial realities of reason and knowledge, and of every demonstrated or conceivable improvement which appertains to time and sense.

Assisted as we shall be through the coming year by an able corps of contributors, we are confident we can make the Fortieth Volume of the INVESTIGATOR acceptable to the Liberal public, and therefore we solicit their continued aid and support. We again ask our old friends who have stood by us so long, and cheered us in our arduous task by their kind patronage, to stand by us through the coming volume; and should any new friends be disposed to enrol their names on our list of subscribers, we think we can furnish them a paper which will prove in all respects satisfactory. At least, this will be our continual study and highest ambition.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION!

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

THE INDEX will be sent for three months to new subscribers on trial for Sixty Cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of Five Cents.

All subscriptions and communications to be addressed to FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Lock Box 19, Toledo, O.

Publishers who insert the above Prospectus three times in their respective papers and call attention to it editorially, shall be entitled to a copy of THE INDEX for one year. It will be forwarded to their address on receipt of the paper with the advertisement.

THE INDEX has in three months reached a circulation which ensures its permanent publication. The wide favor with which it has been received surpasses the most sanguine expectations of its projectors. No effort will be spared to maintain its high character. The next volume will be very materially enlarged, and will give a greater variety of matter.

PUBLIC OPINION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, April 24, 1870.]

"One with God is a majority."

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

"The greatest despotism on earth is an excited and untaught public sentiment."

DE TOCQUEVILLE.

Public opinion is the greatest power in the modern world. Civilization depends upon it. History is made by it. Governments are governed by it. Kings and emperors are compelled to pay obeisance to it. Armies and navies are its tools. Institutions appear and vanish at its command. In a word, public opinion makes and unmakes all things which are subject to the will of man.

What, then, is public opinion? The phrase is on every lip; yet few, perhaps, reflect much on the nature or the limitations of this universally recognized and almost omnipotent power. Authors and orators, men of thought and men of affairs, alike make their appeal to it, and seek to accomplish their ends through its agency; yet few pause to inquire what it is. The question is not an idle one; I think it is connected with many other questions whose importance is more immediately apparent. To the subject of public opinion, therefore, I invite your attention this morning.

Every man thinks, more or less. Between his mind and the outward universe, a process of action and reaction is continually going on. The totality of his surroundings and circumstances creates certain impressions on his senses and higher receptive powers, upon which his intellect perpetually reacts. Opinions, thoughts, beliefs, are the result of this action and reaction. But it is not enough to say that all men think. To some extent they all think alike, and to some extent they all think differently. The degree of likeness in their thought depends in a large measure, though not entirely, on the degree of likeness in their surroundings. Under similar circumstances, men reach a higher degree of unanimity in their opinions than under circumstances which are dissimilar. Thus we find whole communities permeated with common beliefs which to other communities appear strange or absurd. But in no community do we find any two men thinking exactly alike. There is a native difference of constitution or organization which makes a certain amount of peculiarity inevitable in every man. Just as all men have bodies with two legs and two arms, and faces with two eyes, one mouth, and one nose, and yet at the same time differ in the appearance and relative proportions of these common organs; so all men differ in the balance and relative activity of their common intellectual faculties. Unity in diversity is the one eternal truth that confronts us, study the universe under whatever aspect we choose.

Recognizing, therefore, these two facts of agreement on the one hand and disagreement on the other, whenever we consider the state of opinion in any community, we perceive that the phrase "public opinion" properly signifies that great body of beliefs in which all men agree, or, at least, in which the great majority of men agree. We also perceive that the simple fact of common agreement in a body of beliefs proves in all men a certain common or universal nature; while the cognate fact of disagreement with regard to other beliefs proves a certain peculiar or individual nature.

Out of this two-fold fact arises the distinction between public opinion and private opinions.

The first point to be noted, therefore, is that the existence of public opinion proves the existence of a common intellectual nature among all men, together with individual intellectual peculiarities. This is a fact which no one will call in question, being apparently the merest truism. But it implies other facts not quite so obvious. If, neglecting individual peculiarities, we find all men endowed with a common intellectual nature, manifesting itself in a great body of common beliefs which is termed public opinion, then there is a certain universality in the human intellect which can be due only to certain universal laws of thought; and these universal laws of thought must be the true basis of public opinion itself. The possibility of a public opinion depends on the existence of these universal laws. Eliminate the idiosyncracies of individuals, which are due to various differences of organization or education or both combined, and which mutually neutralize each other when men are viewed in the mass,—and there remains the universal reason which compels all sane minds to draw the same conclusions from the same premises. Over and above, therefore, your reason and my reason and the reason of each other individual, there must exist what may be called the reason of the race,—the universal reason of humanity. This universal reason is the root of public opinion, and must conform to certain universal laws which rest ultimately on the nature of things. In this manner the very simple and seemingly unimportant fact that all men think alike in some things and think differently in other things, has conducted us thus far to these significant conclusions:—

1st. That there is a universal reason of the race, governed by universal laws of thought, and independent of individual peculiarities.

2d. That public opinion is the necessary result of the application of this universal reason to existing facts under existing conditions,—in other words, is determined by the actual state of civilization.

3d. That consequently it is unjust to accuse public opinion at any particular epoch of being wilfully wrong, since wilfulness is an individual idiosyncrasy and is eliminated from the action of universal laws.

Now these three conclusions are simple deductions from the fact of unity in diversity, as exhibited in the co-existence of public opinion with private opinions. But observation and historical study supply another fact of great importance, namely, that public opinion changes from age to age, and on the whole in the direction of gradual enlightenment. There is a law of development covering and determining this entire change, which has its ground in the fact that man is a progressive being. The aggregate experience of mankind develops their universal reason. The slow but continuous progress of the race is an ultimate fact of history; and the gradual expansion of the human intellect, adding to the stock of human knowledge ever-fresh accumulations, and thus perpetually enlarging the domain of man's mastery over Nature, increases with each generation the data on which the universal reason of the race is called to act, and thus ensures a progress of public opinion in accordance with the universal laws of thought.

That this gradual amelioration of public opinion follows a strictly logical order of development, analogous to that of a well-constructed argument,—that social progress is simply the logical relations of ideas written out in events—is a fact rarely, if ever, noticed. There is nothing arbitrary in the slow changes of public opinion. History is one long sortes. Reforms can be foretold by pure deduction. The universal reason of man, free from individual prejudices and unbiassed by private ambitions (which neutralize each other), pursues principles to their logical results with marvellous certainty. For instance, the development of the Christian Theology and Church could have been foretold by any mind capable of deducing the logical consequences of the Messianic claim of Jesus. Every such mind will perceive to day that this claim will not reach its logical ultimatum, until the infallibility of the Pope is finally decreed. The Œcumenical Council, fancying itself inspired by the Holy Ghost, obeys simply a law of thought; and even if it should adjourn under the pressure of imperial menaces, none the less will that dogma yet be made authoritative. So also the gradual extension of the franchise in this country takes place in obedience to laws of logic that can neither be defeated nor postponed. Impatient friends of woman suffrage have indignantly inveighed against public opinion for enfranchising the negro before woman. But this was fated. The public opinion which confined suffrage to white males could not be developed into a public opinion which shall extend it to white and black males and females, without passing through the intermediate stage of granting it to white and black males alone. Color, the more superficial difference, must be ignored first—then sex. I do not defend the abstract right of this process,—I point out simply the logical and inevitable path from great actual injustice to complete and final justice. There is no entire satisfaction of the moral sentiment until the goal is reached; but this satisfaction must be gradually won. Public opinion in all its changes obeys a law of logic which is as universal and immutable as the law of gravitation. Herein lies the irresistible power of ideas.

Furthermore, the constant enlargement of human knowledge and the consequent slow rectification of public opinion have an ideal limit in the Absolute or Perfect Reason which comprehends all facts and all truths in the unity of Nature, and to which the gradual development of the universal reason of the race is a real but endless approximation. It is hardly possible to over-estimate the instructiveness of this thought, shedding as it does great light on the philosophy of history, the progress of civilization, and the true relation of science to religion. The Infinite Intelligence which alone explains the gradual development of the social, intellectual and moral life of man, thus appears as itself the ideal end towards which the unintermitting process tends. The fact of a public opinion of mankind, constantly ameliorating in the direction of freedom, equity, and spiritual fellowship, is pregnant with implications which not only fill the philanthropist with delight, but also awaken in the philosophic mind ideas of surpassing sublimity. These I cannot now pause to dwell upon. To our former conclusions, we may now add these:—

4th. That the changes of public opinion, produced by the increase of human knowledge and experience, conform to a law of strict logical development.

5th. That the public opinion of any given period measures the actual development attained by the universal reason of the race.

6th. That the universal reason of the race, thus manifesting itself in gradual but constant ameliorations of public opinion, endlessly approximates to the Absolute Reason which comprehends the entirety of Nature, and constitutes the ideal limit of all intellectual progress.

These are a few of the thoughts suggested by the simple fact of the existence of a public opinion among men. But regarded as a practical power in society, it leads us into a very different train of reflection. The influence of public opinion over social development and individual life is increasing with a rapidity which is deserving of the gravest consideration. So great at present are the facilities for communication of thought through the printing-press, that public opinion is formed quickly enough to be brought to bear upon passing events, in a way to make them more and more clearly the reflex of the people's will. Formerly events came first, and the verdict of the people was so tardy as not appreciably to influence them; now the actors move under the gaze of a beholding world, and play their parts with far less freedom than before. The telegraph and the newspaper concentrate the attention of the race upon a single spot; and concentration is power. A common sentiment of the people, awakened by a common thought, and backed by a common will, thus frequently overbears the too powerful individual, and brings him to terms. Even crowned heads quail under the eyes of millions. Were it not for the vast public opinion of Europe in favor of peace, ambition would continually plunge the continent into war. In this manner we discern the beneficent power of public opinion. It is an appeal from the Chassepot rifle and the needle-gun to ideas,—the substitution of brain for brawn,—the triumph of moral forces over the violence of the brute. It compels the tyrant plausibly to justify his tyranny to his victims, or pay the penalty with his throne. The career of Louis Napoleon is a signal instance of the political trickery indirectly compelled by public opinion, and only endured because public opinion has not yet created instrumentalities through which to assert itself. There can be no doubt that, since the invention of printing, the supremacy of the sword has been gradually undermined, and the foundations laid for the supremacy of reason. When public opinion shall have become the paramount and openly recognized authority of the world, and shall have created fit machinery through which to exercise control in the large affairs of mankind, the era of peace will dawn, and moral forces will permanently suppress the appeal to brutal agencies.

Nevertheless, there are two sides to this picture. Public opinion is a great and growing power; and this fact warns us of a new danger. In that priceless little text-book for all who would study the true relations of the individual to society,—the "Essay on Liberty" of John Stuart Mill,—this danger is most ably pointed out. Under an absolute monarchy, the power of public opinion is reduced to a minimum, power being concentrated in the king. Political activity is restricted, but nevertheless scope is given for the free development of individual tastes and talents. The very fact, however, that in this country the majority is king and rules supreme, tends to foster a peculiar subservency to popular notions, even when they are based on no grounds in reason. Majorities, like individuals, become oppressive by being indulged; and the need of large minorities is often great, if for no other reason than to temper the excessive influence of the dominant party. Individuality is seriously threatened by the advance of civilization; yet without it all moral pith and power are lost. Public opinion, if unenlightened, may be the most hateful of masters,—all the worse because the unreflecting multitude, abusing their power, have taken the place of the shrewd despot, carefully husbanding his. It becomes an omnipresent tyrant,—invisible, yet mighty, armed with terrible weapons, and presenting no vulnerable aspect to face and fight. No assassin can reach it,—no constitution restrict it. It is irresponsible, yet autocratic,—laying its heavy hand on the soul, while sparing the body. It creates such terror of Mrs. Grundy, and exacts such deference to what "the world" may say, that courage wilts and individuality rots away. Hydra-headed and full of menace to the imagination, it yet eludes direct conflict, and cows the spirit by filling it with an undefinable alarm. This influence of public opinion is most injurious to character, and saps the very foundations of sturdy self-respect. It is the peculiar evil of a republican form of government, because it bribes with the hope of popularity and threatens with the dread of social disgrace. Unless some antidote to the poison could be found, it might remain an open question whether the growth of the power of public opinion, doing away with the carnage of ambitious kings, would not debase humanity with fear of a bloodless majority. Outward freedom is poorly paid for with inward slavery. Let me illustrate what I mean by this despotism of a public opinion which is not inspired with reverence for individual liberty of thought and speech and action.

In Paris, I am told, there is far more scope allowed for individual taste in dress than in New York, or other American cities. Here the power of fashion is enormous. Every woman must conform to the prevailing mode, on pain of incurring ostracism from polite circles. Ugly as the current style may be, public opinion requires conformity to it, as the price of recognition by "society." The taste of the individual goes for nothing; the taste of the multitude overrides it, and extinguishes all diversity in dress by its imperious edict. Every woman looks like every other, and wears whatever fashion of attire happens to have become universal for the season. Every man who cares for dress (and young men especially are apt to be as particular on this point as women) must discard his half-worn suit and purchase one in harmony with the style in vogue. Waste of money is the consequence, which only serves to enrich the tailors, whose interest it is to make a change of fashion every season, and who commonly go from one extreme to another, in order to render economy more difficult. This servile observance of the newest fashion, which is so common in America, is one illustration of the extent to which an unenlightened public opinion enslaves the weak in mind.

More oppressive still is the demand that all who would be received well in "society" shall live in an expensive manner. Many a young couple live beyond their means, because they are over-anxious to secure recognition in social circles to which a certain style of living is the only means of entrance. They who more wisely choose to live modestly, and measure their outlay by the length of their purses, are frequently made to feel very uncomfortable by the superciliousness with which they are treated by the empty-headed devotees of social ambition. A fine house must be had, costly furniture bought, and other expenses incurred, or the door is shut upon them by foolish fashion. The strain thus brought upon humble resources is a frequent cause of domestic unhappiness. It is, of course, chiefly in the large cities that this extravagance is submitted to out of deference to a false public opinion; but the evil is not confined to them. A nobler state of society will be impossible until public opinion is educated to place a different respective estimate on waste and economy in living. Much of the commercial crime in large cities springs from the feverish anxiety to shine in society, and the reckless and lavish expenditures for mere display which this desire naturally provokes. Public opinion is now thrown too much on the side of this extravagant mode of living, and consequently corrupts thousands who, left to themselves, would live far more simply and reasonably.

But the tyranny of a perverted public opinion reaches deeper than to the mere superficialities of life. The idea of being thought "odd" or "eccentric" intimidates thousands of minds, not only in their social relations, but even in their private opinions. There is a fashion in thinking, as well as in dressing; and multitudes are as anxious to think as to dress in the most "genteel" manner. The influence of public opinion over individual convictions, in proportion as it becomes powerful, is very apt to become oppressive. In the country or the backwoods, where the pressure of the common thought is little felt by the individual, a sturdiness of mind is developed which, despite the absence of culture, charms every one who delights in native vigor of character. Many a New England farmer, born and bred on his inherited farm, have I known, who would shine in comparison with the average of city people, if judged by the standard of intelligence and independence and moral worth. It is the greatest danger of a high civilization that it tends to merge the individual in the mass, and render more difficult, and consequently less frequent, that robust development of human nature which is indispensable to personal greatness. As man becomes great, men become little. At least, that is the tendency and the peril. It is the fear of being thought singular, eccentric, or odd in opinions, that makes the chief obstacle of reform. We can see this especially in the case of the woman movement. Thousands of women are afraid to come out openly and bravely in favor of woman suffrage, because they dread the reputation of "strong-mindedness," and cower before the invisible yet terrible condemnation of the fashionable world. Unless great natural force of character exists in women, it is seldom that they acquire convictions which instinct alone, regardless of intellectual argument, should foster in their minds. Public opinion, if not enlightened, deadens the souls of its slaves, and robs them of the natural grace and strength of humanity.

The same servitude is to be seen on every hand with regard to religion. The Christian faith is professed by thousands, not because it is true, but because it is fashionable. Were it not for this class of persons, the churches would lose half their adherents. A certain conformity, based on no intelligent thought, but rather compelled by the apish instinct of imitation, does more to uphold the organized religion of the times than all the arguments or persuasions of the preachers. The prestige of establishment is the main bulwark of the Church. Not to believe as the majority believe, or at least not to acquiesce publicly in the dominant belief, is to encounter a degree of obloquy which deters thousands from using their natural faculties on the highest questions that concern the welfare of man.

Young men entering life are too often drawn into the churches for motives which are thoroughly disgraceful, if understood. I have heard many of them say, apparently without being conscious of the degradation they revealed, that they belonged to the Church in order to get into business, or be received well in society. In other words, without caring for the church at all on its own merits, they make themselves hypocrites for the sake of profit or social standing. Others shrink from isolation in their belief from a certain cowardice or dread of self-assertion. What the multitude profess, they profess too, through distrust of themselves; and thus they sacrifice their individuality of character and mind. How strong is the argument from numbers with the majority! Yet its sole basis is fear,—the fear of using one's own mind independently. It is this fear which prevents thousands from reading or hearing opinions which in any degree conflict with the popular standards of faith. The strength of public opinion is too great to be resisted. Yet it must be resisted, or the individual is sacrificed, shackled, and enslaved.

The only remedy for the humiliating bondage to which the multitude doom themselves through their over-weening respect for public opinion, is to educate public opinion until its erroneous influence shall be thrown in favor of individual liberty. A public sentiment must be created that shall encourage, rather than repress, the freedom of individual thought. Confidence in human nature, respect for human powers, trust in self, must be fostered in every one, and made the basis of free and intelligent convictions. In proportion as the power of public opinion increases, reverence for individuality must be developed. All restrictions on the free movement of mind should be removed, as the only condition of a nobler development of society. Education should be so conducted as to call out at the earliest possible moment the latent faculties of the child, and to train them into vigorous and constant activity. The habit of learning by rote in the schools begins the habit of living by rote in the community. It is infinitely better to make some mistakes,—to be erratic in some degree,—than to accept the truth itself simply because the truth is fashionable. Human society will never be what it ought to be, until it becomes the voluntary fellowship of large, free, powerful, and individual men and women. To create a public opinion which shall directly tend to produce this magnificent development of individuality in all mankind, according to the eternal laws of human nature, is the great aim and work of Free Religion.

MACAULAY UPON PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND THE FOUNDERS OF NEW ENGLAND.

I say, therefore, that the education of the people ought to be the first concern of a state. Sir, it is the opinion of all the greatest champions of civil and religious liberty in the Old World and in the New—and of none, I hesitate not to say it, more emphatically than of those whose names are held in the highest estimation by the Protestant nonconformists of England. Assuredly, if there be any class of men whom the Protest ant nonconformists of England respect more highly than another, if any whose memory they hold in deeper veneration, it is that class of men, of high spirit and unconquerable principles, who, in the days of Archbishop Laud, preferred leaving their native country and living in the savage solitudes of a wilderness, rather than to live in a land of prosperity and plenty, where they could not enjoy the privilege of worshipping their Maker freely according to the dictates of their own conscience. Those men, illustrious forever in history, were the founders of the commonwealth of Massachusetts; but, though their love of freedom of conscience was illimitable and indestructible, they could see nothing servile or degrading in the principle that the state should take upon itself the charge of the education of the people. In the year 1642 [1647?] they passed their first legislative enactment on this subject; in the preamble of which they distinctly pledged themselves to this principle, that education was a matter of the deepest possible importance and the greatest possible interest to all nations and to all communities; and that, as such, it was, in an eminent degree, deserving of the peculiar attention of the state.—From Macaulay's Speeches, Vol. II.

SINGULAR BEAUTIES.—We are assured that a "Regular Baptist" pastor, in an adjoining city recently, after inviting "all of the same faith and order" to tarry for the Lord's Supper, made some very appropriate remarks touching the love and tenderness of Jesus, "which," said he, "we can here, all by ourselves, contemplate, with the beauties of close communion."—Morning Star.

The following summary of the proposed dogma of Infallibility is going the rounds in Italy:—"Jesus Christ, who was God, made Himself man to save the world; Pius IX., who is man, makes himself God, to damn it."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"THE INDEX, I think, grows better as it grows older. Every number, I find, seems more interesting than the last. Its trumpet gives no uncertain sound—thank God!—but blows a clear, pure, sweet blast. Its tones ring clear across Ohio, New York and Massachusetts, and are heard distinctly here in Boston, where they awake not a few echoes, some of glad assent, some of harsh dissent. Depend upon it, THE INDEX is bound to do the cause it was started to serve a vast deal of good—and that, too, whether it shall prove to be only a yearling, or shall live on much longer. While there are some out-and-out Radicals who do not feel moved to take exactly the same position that you do in relation to Christianity—and at present I am one of them—yet they are heartily glad to see the distinction between Christianity and Religion so clearly and thoroughly made as you make it in THE INDEX. All Christendom have been confounding, and do still confound, Christianity with Religion,—when in fact, Christianity is only one of the historical religions, and as such it is not the root of Religion itself, but Religion is the root of it. To every one of the historical religions we may say, in the language of Paul, 'Thou bearest not the root, but the root thee.' You show the distinction between that which is universal, and that which is partial,—and this is just what the people need to see. I have ceased to look to Jesus as a perfect teacher; I have ceased to look to Christianity as a perfect system. I find positive defects in both. There is no authority for me outside of my own head and my own heart, however fallible both of these may be. I call no man master in an absolute sense—not even the 'model man of Nazareth.' And yet, as to the Christian name—while I do not cling to it as I once did—while I no longer regard it as a generic and universal title—while I am willing to see it supplanted by any name that will more accurately describe the real thing which we all want—yet I do not at present feel moved to fling the name from me; for it seems to me to have so much more in it than a mere dogmatic meaning, that I am quite willing to confess it until it is used against me as a test of fellowship, and a bar to unlimited freedom of thought; then I will resent it as an impertinence, for no name, no reputation, must stand between my soul and Truth."

—"I see in your last INDEX that you think of enlarging the same. I think it is a mistake, and am confirmed in my thought by a note I received to-day from a sensible and practical woman in a neighboring town, who requested me to write to you and ask you not to do it.

As good as it is (and it is the paper I like to see of all others), it is too large now—sometimes, at least. There is a good deal of work involved in setting up type and printing a paper, and the finding anything printed ought to make us feel that we cannot afford to leave it unread.

Instead of enlarging your sheet I should say it would be better, if you think it best to keep it the present size, not to feel that it must always be filled. Only print that which you think is important—so much so that you can't leave it out—and if the sheet is not filled, let the remainder be a blank. How much more interesting such a blank would be than anything put in to fill up! If there should now and then be a week in which there was nothing worth the labor and ink to record, and the time of all your readers to read, send along the blank sheet—we are entitled to the paper—and, coming from you, it shall be as good as a silent prayer, and they are often the best, you know.

But your little sheet is the last that deserves such advice, and yet is the first to get it. It would be useless to think of attacking with such advice any of the thousand and one great sheets that cover the land, with any hope of curtailing in any appreciable degree the vast, barren, cheerless spaces of prairie that cover them, and in which the danger of getting lost is such, that one had often better not risk taking up one of them. In a business point of view I guess it would be a bad operation, or rather so thinks my 'sensible woman,' and things generally turn out as she says."

—"I have just received a copy, with a Supplement, of THE INDEX. Whether from your hand or some other friend I know not, but permit me to say God bless you for your noble, outspoken sentiments, for your moral courage in coming out from sectarianism to the broad and sacred platform of Liberalism, for your determination to speak your truth at whatever cost, and for your exposition of that policy in Unitarianism that is attempting to gather all into its selfish sectarian folds. I see it everywhere I go, almost, and the poor dupes, lured by the popularity and pretended freedom offered, are bound in creedish chains, ere aware of their real condition. I do not know that you are a Spiritualist, but of one thing I am certain. If you are, you will not deny your belief that our angel loved ones can and do communicate, but acknowledge it to the world as you propose to acknowledge every other revealed principle of Truth."

—"I am much pleased with THE INDEX. It fills a void in my nature which no religious paper ever came near doing before."

—"The Liberal Christian, which has been sent to me during Bro. Clarke's able editorship, has taken the back track, and will now limit its near-sighted vision to the 'interests' of the 'denomination.' I think that many hundreds of its old readers will sympathize with me in preferring something fresh and living from the unfailing well-spring of truth to Dr. Bellows' rehash of stereotyped Unitarianism. I think hundreds will turn as I do to The Radical and The Index with expectant eyes and souls. It is too late in the day for thoughtful and earnest minds to be fed and satisfied at the tables spread in view of strictly 'denominational' interests! The creed of Unitarianism in old Dr. Ware's day can no longer attract or interest the people, or give satisfactory answers to the great stirring questions of our time. A weekly religious paper that should be wholly untrammelled by the petty 'interest' of any church, sect, denomination, or narrowly organized 'movement' of any kind whatever, but should be absolutely free to welcome and present to the public the highest and broadest utterances of our best minds,—this has for years been a day-dream of mine. Thousands must be ready to welcome a journal that shall be too far-sighted to allow petty and temporary, if not merely personal claims, to eclipse from its vision the best interests of humanity. It must be that your paper will be eagerly welcomed and, in time, well supported. The polar opposite to the narrow and barren 'sectarian' paper, will be one of the most cheery and hopeful signs of the times.

I am very sorry to add that I am at present wholly unable to enclose even the amount of your very moderate subscription. I have been for many years a great invalid and have at present no pecuniary resources or assured means of support. 'Silver and gold have I none,' &c. I am indebted to the editor of The Radical for that magazine, and I want your paper, and if you will send it I will do what I can in return."

—"Two numbers of your paper have reached me, and I have read them with enjoyment, and almost entirely sympathize with you in your great undertaking, though I am most apprehensive of the result. In the first place your martyrdom is certain; you will have to run the gauntlet of a criticism that will not leave you a shred of your 'inner man' untorn. The impulses of humanity are very much the same everywhere, and while the age in which we happen to live saves you from the fire or the rope or the rack, you will nevertheless experience the baptism that burns to the quick; the best of Christians will brand you with orthodox anathemas.

For mad as Christians used to be About the thirteenth century,
There's lots of Christians to be had
In this, the nineteenth, just as bad."

—"I am just in receipt of No. 7 of THE INDEX, the first that I have seen, and the first notice that such a publication existed, until my attention was called to it by a discourse delivered in Chicago by the Rev. Dr. Powers, of St. John's Church, in which he takes three 'Affirmations' of yours for his text. You have doubtless seen his criticisms, which are uttered in a spirit of candor and fairness seldom characteristic of the class of religionists to which he belongs. It is refreshing and hopeful to see such sweetness of spirit manifested by a man in his position. A report of his sermon you have doubtless seen in last week's Tribune."

—"I have seen the first number of your paper, and like it very much. Will you send it for any less time than a year? If so, I will enclose the amount for six months, and forward the same on receipt of back numbers, and will endeavor to procure other subscribers. Give us freedom in religion as well as in everything else. Emancipate us from the superstitions of the age, the dogmas of the church, and the hobgoblins of Spiritualism. I take the Boston Investigator, and am a member of an orthodox church, if I am not recently expelled."

—"Enclosed you will find amount for one or two copies of your new journal called THE INDEX. I am a subscriber to the Liberal Christian, but as they are about to make that journal an organ of supernaturalism, etc., I desire a more free organ of intelligence and thought on the question of religion. If your paper comes up to my views of the foundation of religion and theology, I expect to subscribe for it."

—"Although I still feel justified in calling myself a Christian and desire to retain the name, I am heartily glad of an opportunity to become the recipient of your thoughts and the results of your researches. I know you will not consider me impertinent, if I say that I sympathize with you in your enterprise, and am very certain the paper will do a great deal of good."

—"Having received the first number of THE INDEX, I wish to see what follows. I enclose two dollars subscription for the year. I am a friend of Free Religion, yet I now think Liberal Christianity, by the prominence it gives to the universal elements of religion, opens the door of perfect freedom."

—"I shall always be glad and ready to put any good radical in the way of so good and straight-forward a guide as THE INDEX."

—"Thousands crave just such food. Would that they all might find it! I hope to be able to place it in the way of a few."

—"Christianity seeks no higher perfection than the teachings of Christ, and they are nearly two thousand years old, and, like everything else of that date, has been or will be displaced by something better—Faith, not in Christ, but in Human Nature."

—"If you will send an extra number or two, I will do what I can to get some subscribers. It would be a happy thing if some little sap could be got into the dry bones about this region."

—"I am very much like the young lady who was asked if she was engaged. 'Not as yet,' was the significant reply. I'm not as yet a free religionist, but I am a truth-lover."

—"After reading THE INDEX about fifteen minutes, I desire to become a subscriber."

LOCAL NOTICES.

The FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY meets every Sunday morning, at 10½ o'clock, in the church on the corner of Adams and Superior streets. Sunday School at 12. The public are cordially invited to attend.

The RADICAL CLUB will meet in the same place, at 7½ o'clock, Sunday evening, May 8. The committee on drafting articles of association, appointed May 1, and consisting of Messrs. Howe and Abbot, will make their report, which will be the subject of the evening's discussion.

"The annual election of the TOLEDO LIBRARY ASSOCIATION will take place at the Library Rooms, corner of Madison and Summit streets, on Monday, May 9, from 4 to 9, P. M. In this Association, women vote on equal terms with men, namely, on payment of an annual membership fee of $3.00. All persons interested in the support of a good Public Library are urged to show their interest by becoming members, and voting as such. Members of the TOLEDO WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION in particular will, it is hoped, manifest the earnestness of their desire for the ballot by purchasing tickets and exercising their right of suffrage in the T. L. A. for the good of the community.

The ladies of Toledo will shortly be visited at their homes in behalf of the ORPHAN'S HOME SOCIETY. The membership fees which it is thus hoped to obtain are needed to meet a debt of $2,000 still due for the grounds and building, and to raise means for defraying the current expenses of the year. The treasury of the Society contains no more than is necessary to pay debts already due for these expenses; and the smallest sums contributed will be gratefully received.

PICTURES FROM OVID:

II. THE DELUGE OF DEUCALION.

The flaming bolts, by swarthy Cyclops wrought,
 Jove cast aside, and other vengeance sought.
 A different doom decreed his fateful mind—
 With foaming waves to overwhelm mankind,
 To loose the floods, from heaven resistless hurled,
 And pour destruction on the guilty world.
 Instant, within the Æolian caves profound
 The unruly Northwind lies securely bound,
 And, shared his fetters, there his mates repine
 Who idly strive to thwart the will divine.
 On humid pinions poised, the Southwind flies
 Forth from his cave, and clouds before him rise;
 His face by dark, dense vapors is concealed,
 His beard and hoary locks cold moisture yield,
 While drip his vesture and each reeking wing,
 And mists and fogs from his damp forehead spring.
 Pressed by his hand, the wide-o'erhanging cloud
 Pours down the rain and thunders long and loud;
 The gay-robed messenger of Juno flies,
 Collects the waters, and the clouds supplies;
 While the prone harvest and the prostrate ear
 (O wasted labor of the toilsome year!)
 The husbandman beholds with vain desire,
 And weeps to see his cherished hopes expire.

The Index.

MAY 7, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

There is something at once grand and pathetic in the announcement that the Anti-Slavery Society has finally disbanded, with the consent of Wendell Phillips. What a work of moral enlightenment has been accomplished by this little band of prophetic spirits! It was for long and dark years the torch of truth, lighting up the gloom of unfaithful times,—the voice of the conscience of the age, rebuking the iniquities of a false republic. Posterity will find in its sublime protest the one redeeming memory of degraded days. Unfading glory be to those who remembered the dignity of Man, when politicians conspired to rivet his chains and priests baptized his bondage as divine! Freedom is at last justified by her children.

Henry Ward Beecher says that "the prime failing of Free Religion is that it requires men to live in a vacuum." He objects to exchanging the unventilated, superheated, stifling atmosphere of the Church, heavy with carbonic acid and foul with the effluvia of crowded and perspiring saints, for the freshness and purity and exhilaration of the great ocean of oxygen outside. The "vacuum" of Free Religion is "all out-doors."

The Ladies' Own Magazine for May is an excellent number of an excellent monthly. It is full of a spirit that touches and deepens the best aspirations of human nature, and must exert an influence for good in every home it enters. It deserves to be well supported, and doubtless will be.

We understand that Austin Kent, of Stockholm, N. Y., who has been a liberal of the liberals all his life and made many sacrifices for his principles, is now poor, and old, and physically helpless. We believe that whoever shall find it in his heart to send him by mail a remittance, however trifling, will assist one who deserves assistance.

THE "INVISIBLE CHURCH."

Perceiving the narrowness which would make church-membership the test and proof of real goodness, many Christians are accustomed to distinguish between the "visible church," or outward organization, and the "invisible church," or fellowship of all consistent and sincere believers both inside and outside of the external organized body. They indulge the hope that the "invisible" embraces a vastly larger number of such believers than the "visible" church, since they are quite as well aware as the beholding public that sheep and wolves in sheep's clothing are disgracefully mixed together in the "fold."

It strikes us that there is also an "invisible church" of free thought. Many radicals disgrace radicalism by unprincipled and impure lives; and many who in the secrecy of their own hearts are thoroughly in sympathy with it, shrink from all public avowal of this sympathy. The body of free-thinkers is immensely larger than men suppose. Emerson says that "all the young intellect of America is radical." He would have been still nearer the truth if he had omitted the adjective. The amount of latent scepticism regarding Christianity is enormous. It is safe to say that no intelligent and well-read man is free from it. We have conversed with many open defenders of the Christian theology in whose words, tone and manner we saw that, while stoutly contending against us, they were contending against themselves as well. We had an invisible ally in their citadel, a "traitor in the heart" far more potent than any argument of ours. The sagacity with which such persons evade the point,—the skill with which they raise false issues, rush off on side-tracks, and obscure the question by hiding themselves, like cuttle-fish, in their own ink,—the impossibility, in fact, of bringing them face to face with the problem in any honest manner,—convinces us that their loud-mouthed faith is as empty a "shell" as was the Southern Confederacy.

The reasons for this insincerity are various. Some fatally distrust themselves, and dare not drop the leading-strings of tradition, dreading to fall into some bottomless abyss of "infidelity." Others deliberately trim their sails to suit the popular breeze, for the sake of ulterior advantage to themselves. And so on. This suppression of real conviction is in all cases, we believe, connected with an excessive reverence or a degrading fear of public opinion. The argument from numbers is the strongest argument with many minds for the truth of the Christian "scheme of redemption;" and it silences that inward protest of reason to which they dare not listen. Such persons are as honest as cowards can be. Cowardice, at least, always tends to hypocrisy. But the dissimulation practised by the multitudes who secretly despise the popular follies, yet conform to them with politic compliance, saps the very foundations of character. Such persons are the veriest bond-slaves of public opinion. They do not suspect that there are myriads like themselves; and if all should avow openly their sincere belief, they would be amazed by finding themselves in the majority. Their slavery is as gratuitous as it is humiliating. Who has not reflected that, if the horse only knew his strength, he would speedily free himself from his master? Intelligence on his part would soon render harness-making a profitless investment. So courage and combination on the part of these timid, truckling liberals would soon shatter into a thousand fragments the rotten yoke of public opinion. In the name of everything that is manly, let such persons come out boldly and proclaim their sentiments.

CONSOLIDATION.

Last week we sent the following communication to the Revolution, the Woman's Journal, the Woman's Advocate, and the New York Independent.—

ED. ———:

Will you permit me to propose in your columns a plan for securing unity of action among the friends of woman suffrage, and to request your editorial opinion as to its advisability? It is simply as follows:—

1. That the American Woman Suffrage Association and the National Woman Suffrage Association, at their respective meetings soon to be held in New York City, vote to unite in calling a National Convention at some place and time mutually agreed upon.

2. That both these Associations, at the conclusion of their respective sessions, vote to adjourn without day.

3. That the Committee which called the Conference at the Fifth Avenue Hotel on April 6, vote to withdraw the constitution and list of officers which it has published as its proposed basis of union.

4. That the National Convention, thus called by the concurrent vote of the two existing Associations, draft its own constitution, elect its own officers, and determine its own name.

5. That the friends of woman suffrage agree to ignore all past issues, and work with a will to support the Association thus made in form and in fact representative of the entire movement.

F. E. ABBOT.

TOLEDO, O., April 25, 1870.

Whether this communication has been or will be printed, we do not know at the present writing. It sketches what we consider to be the only absolutely equitable plan for uniting the Associations already organized, requiring as it does no greater sacrifice from one than from the other, and leaving the projected Association in perfect liberty to organize itself untrammelled by any previously arranged programme. Whatever objections may lie against this plan, must lie against the entire project of consolidating the existing Associations. We do not see how any sincere friend of consolidation can object to it. Whether consolidation is in itself desirable, is a question concerning which opinions may honestly differ. All who believe that separate sects accomplish more good than a single united and powerful body, will naturally prefer to see this principle carried out in the agitation of the woman question; while all who believe that sectarian divisions create ill-will, prejudice outsiders, and in petty rivalries squander power which ought to be concentrated in promoting the great practical ends of reform, will prefer to see adopted the broader principle of mutual sympathy and co-operation. If the National and American Associations really represent irreconcilable ideas or methods, division will inevitably continue; but we cannot discover that this is the case. In the West, at least, we believe a strong sentiment exists in favor of concentration. Unless some means can be discovered of bringing it about, we are satisfied that a Western Association will eventually be formed, and that sectarianism will thus be increased. Such a step we should look upon with disfavor and regret; but we see no way to prevent it but through a union of forces at the East. In the hope of preventing any such ultimate reduction of the woman movement to hash, we have ventured to propose an impartial plan of union, trusting that its impartiality will be its sufficient recommendation.

The French Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres has recommended, by a large majority, M. Renan for the chair of Professor of Hebrew at the College of France.—Manchester (Eng.) Daily Examiner and Times.

QUESTIONS ADDRESSED

To those ministers who claim the name "Christian," and do not believe in Jesus the Christ.

1. Is it consistent with the doctrines of the Christian religion, as taught by Jesus and his apostles, to call yourselves, or silently suffer yourselves to be called Christian ministers, when you do not believe in his Messiahship?
 2. Could a man honestly call himself a royalist, if he believes in republicanism and works for it?
 3. Do you believe you can do more good by retaining the name Christian than by dropping it? If so, how?
 4. Do you believe that Christianity and the Christian Church include all goodness and truth?
 5. Do you not think that you do as much harm as good by a course which involves a constant struggle with the churches for a mere name?
- I entreat you who do not believe that Jesus is the divine Christ, as claimed by him and taught by the Church, to enlighten us on these points.

CARL H. HORSCH.

"THE PROPOSED FUSION."

NEW YORK, April 20, 1870.

Editor of The Index:—

Will you allow a subscriber heartily to second your earnest plea for union among the friends of Woman Suffrage? While so doing, it seems to me that the result of the Conference at the Fifth Avenue Hotel has been to throw the responsibility of further disagreement upon the representatives of one only of the rival associations—the American or Boston Society. Having read carefully the account of the conference in the "Tribune," the "Independent" and the "Revolution," with the semi-official reply to Mr. Tilton's praise-worthy effort for union, of representatives of the American association, evidently from the pen of Wm. Lloyd Garrison, the writer can come to no other conclusion. Miss Anthony, Mrs. Stanton and the leaders of the National Association everywhere and in every way indicate their desire for harmony, even at the expense of their positions as officers in the society. A New England abolitionist and the son of one,—whose political education came under the influence of the "Liberator," when that paper was the bulwark of human rights in America,—I remember enough of my early uncompromising lessons there learned to sympathize with those noble women who would have rejected the half-loaf of manhood-suffrage, offered in the Fifteenth Amendment, as compromising their demand of "all rights for all." But the Fifteenth Amendment is passed, and I rejoice in it.

The quarrel now existing can be only and solely personal. Stephen Foster said, in my hearing, at the anniversary last year in this city, that he would not become a member of a society in which Mrs. Stanton was an officer or leader. If the leaders of the American Association adhere to this proscriptive policy against these noble women, when all cause for difference of opinion has passed away, the people should know it, and the blame rest where it belongs.

For harmony and the speedy triumph of the good cause,

Yours sincerely,

LEWIS G. JANES.

ANOTHER WORD FOR ETERNAL LIFE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

You seek Truth, and therefore will not refuse another word on the subject of Immortality. "That law is love, is the generalized lesson of our own experience of this life, while we have had no experience of a life to come. That is why we are more sure that the Universal Power is benevolent, than we are that the soul is immortal." These are your words. The personal experience of a man with large religious and intellectual endowments, and a nature in all directions well balanced, will undoubtedly furnish him the lesson that Law is Love; because he discerns that all the vicissitudes of life minister to his highest needs,—that the human soul is created with adaptations to every possible circumstance, so that even in the keenest suffering there exists an element tending to largest growth, and his hope of immortality is so strong as to be in its influence nearly allied to absolute belief. But consider the case of a man of these same high endowments, but wanting a nice balance somewhere,—born, for instance, with the passion of hot wrath, which, when the terrible occasion is furnished, swamps both conscience and intellect, and fires him to do that at thought of which a few moments before he would have asked, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" and the consequence is life-long remorse and the entire deprivation of liberty and the pursuit of happiness, in solitary imprisonment for life. What will be the generalized lesson of his experience? What, that of the mother who gave him life—of the wife and children of his affections—unless they have laid strong hold on the great eternity which will finally adjust all things to the music of the Law of Love? Consider, also, the case of one less highly endowed, yet possessing the affections, aspirations, needs of our common humanity; who inherits in accordance with law some frightful ancestral blemish, which makes virtue and happiness, so far as this life is concerned, almost an impossibility—saddest and most mysterious of all human problems! He also from the commission of crime finds himself without the love and confidence of his fellow-men, and in the solitary cell his physical and mental faculties are hourly tortured into a death more cruel than that inflicted by the inquisition. How shall this man's experience teach him, that Law is Love? How shall we who look on quiet our agony, while we exclaim—"Oh God! thy way is in the deep, and thy path in the dark waters, and thy footsteps are not known!"—if we may not with unswerving confidence believe in the benignant Justice, which in the great eternity reconciles all things to itself, making even this sin and misery result in the final setting in order of the jarring elements of his being, which were deranged because God could not institute a wiser law, and law must rule. Instances might be multiplied of the evil,—positive evil, if the present is all of life,—arising from this single law of inheritance; but every one's own experience as an observer and partaker of life can fill up the picture, and abundantly prove that, if man be not immortal, Law is not Love.

Again you say—"We do not love existence, as we love virtue, and virtue is its own sufficient reward." A response to this sentiment comes down to us through all ages, and with as deep utterance from those who but faintly dreamed of a hereafter, as from those who could exultingly say—"I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life." The less the hope, the higher the proof that it is the very breathing of immortality itself which so attuned their souls to the music of eternal Truth, that they needed not the incentive of a hereafter to fix their choice upon virtue rather than existence, when the one conflicted with the other. To what can the virtue of such men worthily minister, if only to that of other creatures of a day, who to-morrow vanish into nothingness? Where would be the wisdom of creating a being higher than the sphere of his life? It would be like endowing an animal with all the aspirations and needs of a man, yet limiting him to the lower life of a brute. Such are not God's ways. The tree is not struck with death at the moment it arrives at perfection. It flourishes long in the pride of its glory and begins to decay only when its power to assimilate elements of its own kind from earth and air begins to fail. So with man's physical life. The body dies when disease or old age destroys its power to assimilate food, or it dies when food cannot be obtained; but here is a human soul in the very fulness and vigor of life, in obedience to the highest law of his nature, when occasion demands, voluntarily going down to so-called death. Why should such an one die? And just in that heroic moment when he proves himself worthy to live! His food is Truth—"every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." The capacity to assimilate it has not failed—his appetite for it has not failed—and the supply of this spiritual nutriment is inexhaustible. How then can he die? We believe that space is infinite because we can conceive of no bounds. Somewhat in the same manner we believe that Man is immortal, because we are shut up to the necessity of this faith.

"Thou madest man, he knows not why;

He thinks he was not born to die,

And thou hast made him—Thou art just."

BREVITY.

[Has not our friend blended two questions which had better be kept distinct,—the question of immortality and the question of evil? We do not see how evil can be explained, even if the fact of immortality should be demonstrated. The cases supposed remain inexplicable on any hypothesis,—seem in any case to militate against the idea that law is love. Inherited moral disabilities cannot be denied to exist. If the soul is immortal, no rational grounds can be discovered for believing that moral inequalities will ever be arbitrarily removed. A necessity in the nature of things that evil shall be the price of greater good, is, we think, the only conceivable vindication of the infinite Rectitude. If this is true, the problem of evil is solved on both hypotheses, or on neither. Immortality itself will not undo a single sin or cause a single tear not to have flowed. One question is not answered by raising another. Nothing but positive proof will, in our judgment, warrant an absolute belief. For positive proof of immortality we look in vain, since we find no such proof either in the alleged Christian revelation or in the alleged demonstrations of Spiritualism. But a hope remains,—a hope not without strong grounds; and since disproof seems just as impossible as proof, we count hope the highest wisdom.—Ed.]

DEFINITIONS.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Reading and thinking concerning the True, the Beautiful, and the Good, the following definitions arose in my mind:—

The True is the relation between Unity and Diversity, or Cause and Effect.

The Beautiful is the relation between Essence and Form.

The Good is the relation between God and the Soul.

Truth is evolved whenever Unity passes into Diversity; therefore, Unity is the Supreme Truth, or Reality.

Beauty is evolved whenever Essence passes into Form; therefore, Essence is the Supreme Beauty.

Good is evolved whenever the Infinite passes into Finite Being; therefore, God is the Supreme Good.

Love is the central element of the Good. Therefore, love is that which primarily streams from the Infinite into Finite Being. Justice is the law of this transmission. Justice signifies the giving to each his own. Hence we owe love to the Infinite Being. So also we owe to human beings love because they are at centre "one with God". If we give pure love primarily to God and man, all the virtues follow in its track. If we give to man love, which belongs to his most interior nature, we shall withhold nothing that belongs to his most interior nature, we shall withhold nothing that belongs to his entire nature. "The greater includes the less." Love to God and love to man, or universal justice, is the true Religion.

On the human side, the Good finds expression through man's moral nature. This is the "Kingdom of the Will". It is only when the will is inspired by holy Love that it renders obedience to the "Highest Law," and manifests outwardly the indwelling Good. The moral nature of man is the sanctuary of the Most High. It is the holy place, the "Shekinah", that has been prefigured by all the temples and cathedrals of the world of worshippers since the advent of humanity. It is only by means of the love-inspired will that the attributes of God are manifested in every deed.

There are three classes of inspired persons, and all of them are religious. First, those who revere the ever blessed Unity as manifested in mode or law; they are lovers and reporters of Truth. Second, those who apprehend the Divine Essence as manifested in form; they are lovers and creators of Beauty. Third, those who love God as the Infinite Fountain of Beneficence; they are lovers and doers of Good.

CHRISTENDOM AND HEATHENDOM.

BY C. B. WEBSTER.

The old ideas of God and of his government are rapidly passing away and making room for a more rational conception and confession. There has been altogether too much reasoning in Christendom of a pious sort, too much talk about the divine intention, too much speculation as to what the divine wisdom ought to do and the manner in which it ought to display itself. "Men make God in their own image", says Volney; and so there have been attributed to the Divine Being passions and caprices like unto their own. From time immemorial men have represented Him as having likes and dislikes—as electing certain people from among his children upon whom he capriciously lavishes peculiar blessings to the exclusion of the non-elect. The ancient Jews put in a special plea for themselves, and the whole of Christendom follows their example, arrogates to itself in a special manner the divine favor, and regards itself the religious aristocracy of the world.

As the real spirit of Christianity comes to be appreciated and understood, it is seen "that there is no respect of persons" with God, and that the divine government is a democracy where all men are bound together in the bonds and feelings of a common humanity,—a humanity broken up indeed into many families, separated by differences of country, complexion, language and religion, yet governed always by the same wisdom and beneficence and having approach to the same Universal Spirit. Whenever a human race is found—from whatever quarter of the earth it lifts its face heavenward—beneath whatever sky it rears its altars of worship,—whatever the name inscribed thereon—in whatever language it prays its prayer or utters its aspiration,—there are God's children giving Him recognition, service and worship, according to the light that is in them. The spirit of Christianity declares this! Men say that it is the supreme religion of the world, without knowing—or without daring to confess—wherein its supremacy consists. They do not consider that it is its face of catholicity and charity smiling its everlasting smile across all the countries and over all the world which makes it more divine. This is its crowning glory, and when this catholicity and charity are denied, its greatness is departed.

This spiritual fact imposes serious obligations as to our manner of regarding other religions and the people to whom they are essential and dear. It may seem to be urging a lesson, before the hour for it is fully come, when one remembers that the lesson of tolerance among Christian sects is not yet learned. But the greater includes the less. Could we regard all religions providential and divine—as springing from the religious nature of man as man—the utterance of universal need, the voice of universal aspiration, the inevitable upreaching and inreaching of the human for the divine—the search of the child for his father, we should stand more really within the spirit and more really grasp the idea of Absolute Religion. The Church of Christendom would not then be—what now it most certainly is to our shame—"aristocracy nursing the prejudices of caste and the spirit of exclusiveness and dogmatism".

As Christendom comes to deal with other races of the world through the various appointments of civilization which are rapidly drawing together different portions of it, it must drop the assumption that its religion is a special revelation from God, while all the other religions of the world are only vague and superstitious outreachings after Him. For the assumption there is no decent ground—it is an importation from ancient Judaism, wicked and gratuitous. If the letter of it does not disallow it, the spirit of it most certainly does, or if not, then by so much must it be disallowed and denied. Given the superiority of Christianity, there is no evidence under heaven competent to prove it to the people now beyond its pale and rapidly coming under some of its influences, but the exhibition of a finer spirit and the practical illustration of a far higher morale than anything yet uttered in the face of the world. Up to the present time Christian civilization in transplanting itself has succeeded chiefly in exporting the vices which distinguish it. In almost every portion of the uncivilized world it stands for avarice, deception and tyranny; a multitude of sins undreamt of before has followed in its wake, and crimes, beyond the ingenuity of ignorance and heathenism to invent, have heralded its advent. "Christian Missions," the world over, are a failure; and considering the sort of Christianity we have exported it is a failure which calls for gratitude unfeigned. Let us pluck out the beam from our own eye before we attempt the mote in that of our "pagan" brothers. When we have got into the heart of the Christian religion—when we have come to understand its essential spirit and the point wherein its true greatness and supremacy consist—when we have learned to live up to the simplest word of our faith which is also the essential teaching of all religions, namely, that the moral forever takes precedence of the material—when we have come to stand and work in the world, not on our dignity as a white skinned race, nor on our dignity as Christians, but as men dealing with brother men—when we have come to teach others, not for our own spiritual aggrandizement or for what we can get out of them—when, in fine, we have accepted the logical conclusion of Christianity that God hath made of one blood all the nations of the earth, "we shall be prepared to put the girdle of our faith around the world."

THE MODERN PHYSICAL THEORY OF A FUTURE LIFE.

BY J. T. C.

It is now no longer doubtful that there are two kinds of substance, one subject to gravity, the other not, or to a very slight degree. This imponderable substance, the ether, pervades the interstices of the densest matter; so that, after withdrawing the ponderable matter from a so-called vacuum to such an extent that electricity no longer passes, we find that light passes undiminished.

The following theory may be held as a possible one—that we are composed of these two substances, which during life blend together into one integer, but separate at death, the ponderable substance being pulled down by gravitation and decomposed; but the imponderable etherial part holding together, having during life gradually obtained an independence in its motions from the motions of the surrounding ether. This seems to be the only theory of a future life that shows any sign of ability to withstand the tests of modern science, which rejects as a chimera the theory of an immaterial soul so devoutly held by the last few generations of Europeans.

MENTAL VIGOR IN BODILY INFIRMITY.—There are many persons in Paris who can still remember the beau jeune homme, so elegant in person, dress and manners, who was the life of the Jockey Club, the race-course, and the ball-room. When still under forty years of age his sight first began unaccountably to fail him, and then gradually his other senses and limbs, until literally nothing was left but his mind. The soul seemed to survive the body, and the latter, unable in any way to serve the wants of the former, may be said to have sat for eighteen years in an arm-chair, waiting for death. Arms, legs, hands, eyes, every member had lost the power of being useful, and made their unhappy owner absolutely dependent upon the care of others. Nothing remained of this extraordinary existence but the mind. But that was wonderfully brilliant to the last; and from his arm-chair, even, Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild made his existence felt, it may almost be said, over the world. Perhaps such a life was not harder to bear for him on whom it fell, than for the still young wife, who left the world and society to devote herself to supply the privations of her husband.—Phil. Bulletin.

"THOSE WOMEN'S RIGHTS FOLKS."—The terror they are to many innocent persons, is most amusing. At the recent Woman's Suffrage Convention at St. Albans, Mrs. Campbell, of Springfield, said that, while on her way to the Brattleboro Convention, a party of musicians got into the car. They clustered around the stove, a most disreputable-looking set, and were not, to say the least, desirable travelling companions. Near Mrs. Campbell sat a young lady; and presently she came over and said: "May I sit down with you? I'm afraid of those men. Do you know I think they must be the band that travels around with those Women's Rights folks?" Mrs. Campbell took the frightened girl under her protection; but didn't tell her that she'd come for shelter to one of those dreadful women, and the girl never suspected it.—N. Y. Revolution.

Bishop Simpson says of President Lincoln's religious views, that whatever they might have been in his early years, he experienced a great change later in life, and was doubtless an evangelical man.—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

Miscellaneous.

OUR NATIONAL DUTY TOWARD THE INDIANS.

[From a speech by Wm. F. Prosser, of Tennessee, delivered in Congress Jan 25, 1870.]

OUR INDIAN POLICY COMPARED TO THAT OF CHARLES V.

But besides the recognized citizens of New Mexico there are in that Territory some seven thousand semi-civilized people, Pueblo Indians, who, residing in permanent, well-built villages, supporting themselves by agricultural and manufacturing industry, are nearly equal in civilization to the lower order of the Mexican citizens. But their progress in civilization is not due in any degree to the institutions or the legislation of this liberal Republic. Our treatment of the Indians has been altogether of a different character. It was commenced three hundred and twenty-four years ago by Charles V, then Emperor of Spain and governing the Spanish provinces in America. As an example and a lesson to our free Republic, and a rebuke to our Indian policy in this nineteenth century, I offer a paper illustrating the policy of that Emperor of the sixteenth century, being a translation from the Spanish archives in New Mexico, and ask that it may be read.

Translation.

"The first disposition of these matters found in our code of laws is that of the Emperor Charles V, made at Cigales on the 21st of March, 1551, and afterward adopted by King Phillip II, which literally reads as follows:—The effort has been made with much care and particular attention to make use of such means as are most suitable for the instruction of the Indians in the holy Catholic faith and scriptural law, to the end that, forgetting their ancient rites and ceremonies, they might live in fellowship under established rule; and in order that this object might be obtained with the greatest certainty the members of our council of the Indies and other religious persons on different occasions met together, and in the year 1546, by order of the Emperor Charles V, of glorious memory, there convened the prelates of New Spain, who, desiring to render service to God and ourselves, resolved that the Indians should be brought to settle, reduced to pueblos, and that they should not live divided and separated by mountains and hills, depriving themselves of all benefit, spiritual and temporal, without aid from our agents, and that assistance which human wants require men mutually to render one another. And in order that the propriety of this resolution might be recognized, the Kings, Judges, Presidents, and Governors were charged and commanded by different orders of the Kings, our predecessors, that with much mildness and moderation they should carry into effect the reduction, settlement, and instruction of the Indians; acting with so much justice and delicacy that without causing any difficulty a motive might be presented to those who could not be brought to settle, in the hope that as soon as they witness the good treatment and protection of such as had been reduced to pueblos they might consent to offer themselves of their own accord; and order was given that they should not pay higher duties than were established by law; and whereas the above was executed in the large part of our Indies, therefore we ordain and command that in all the other portions care be taken that it be carried into effect, and the agents should urge it according to, and in the form declared by the laws of this title."

THE PUEBLOS APPEAL FOR SCHOOLS IN VAIN.

Mr. Prosser. Under this Christian and benignant policy of a wise Emperor—a man imbued with the spirit of religion, and appreciating the necessity of humanity for education—these aborigines were reduced to villages, of which nineteen still remain, and were instructed in the various arts of civilization, in the Spanish language, in religion, and the elements of a common-school education. Will it be believed that under the Government of this enlightened Republic these people have been retrograding instead of advancing, going back to barbarism instead of improving; that under the Spanish and Mexican Governments their interests were more carefully consulted than under our own? Yet such is the fact, and year after year their agents have appealed in vain, with two slight exceptions, for assistance or some appropriation to keep up instruction among them, or to advance them in the scale of civilization. The report of their special agent for the year 1868 closes as follows:—

"Please do urge this matter: it is now eleven years since these Indians have received anything in the shape of presents direct from the Government. If we cannot obtain schools or any other means to improve their dormant condition we ought to be able to secure for them a few hoes and spades, to aid them in the cultivation of the soil, at least."

Nor is this the only tribe which has appealed to us again and again in tones which should touch the most obdurate heart for educational facilities, but which have fallen almost entirely without effect upon the ears of our Legislative and Executive Departments.

THE TREATMENT OF THE WINNEBAGOES.

As an illustration let me send the following letter to the Clerk's desk that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:—

OMAHA RESERVE, December, 30, 1864.

Our Great Father at Washington, all greeting:—From the chiefs, braves, and headmen of your dutiful children, the Winnebagoes.

Father, we cannot see you. You are far away from us. We cannot speak to you, and, Father, we hope you will read our letter and answer us. Father, some years ago, when we had our homes on Turkey river, we had a school for our children, where many of them learned to read and write and work like white people, and we were happy. Father, many years have passed away since our school was broken up; we have no such schools among us, and our children are growing up in ignorance of those things that should render them industrious, prosperous, and happy, and we are sorry. Father, it is our earnest wish to be so situated no longer. It is our sincere desire to have again established among us such a school as we see in operation among your Omaha children. Father, as soon as you find a permanent home for us, will you not do this for us? And, Father, as we would like our children taught the Christian religion as before, we would like our school placed under the care of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. And last, Father, to show you our sincerity, we desire to have set apart for its establishment, erection, and support all of our school funds, and whatever more is necessary.

Father, this is our prayer, will you not open your ears and heart to us, and write to us?

In testimony of our wish, we, the chiefs, braves and headmen of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, do subscribe our names on this the 30th day of December, 1864.

Signed by thirty-eight chiefs and headmen of the Winnebagoes.

Hon. W. P. Dole, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. Prosser. Sir, this tribe of Indians had at the time that letter was written been forcibly taken from good homes in Minnesota, where they had schools among them, and moved to Nebraska and kept in an almost starving condition. They continually begged for schools for their children, and though the Government held large sums of their money in trust with which good schools might have been sustained, yet such is the supreme indifference of the "Great Father" toward the education of his red children that it required five years to get a half-day school established among them.

IS WAR OR EDUCATIONAL POLICY THE BEST?

The history of the Indian tribes within our limits through all the long years since our Government was organized is full of disregarded appeals to the humanity of the national authorities. Mr. Speaker, your heart would bleed with pity and compassion to read their frequent applications for simple justice, knowing, as you do, that the merest fraction of the sums expended in carrying on wars against them, and keeping armed forces in their territory, if judiciously spent in educating and civilizing them, would have been far more beneficial to the Indians and more creditable and profitable to the whole country. It is estimated by the last Commissioner of Indian Affairs that $500,000,000 have been expended in the last forty years in carrying on Indian wars that might have been almost entirely avoided by a different policy. It is the merest folly to say that the Indian cannot be educated or civilized. We have never made the attempt in earnest. I have myself known of Indian reservations kept up for years with hundreds and thousands of Indians upon them and not the slightest effort made to educate the younger portion of them, or to lift any of them up out of their state of barbarism and ignorance. Occasionally, a feeble attempt of the kind has been made, but too often worthless wretches were employed for the purpose who had at heart neither the interests of the Indian nor of the Government. Who is responsible for the fact that we, after a national existence of nearly one hundred years are to-day groping in the fogs of experiment in our treatment of the Indians, and only approaching the policy successfully pursued by the French and Spanish settlers in America more than three hundred years ago?

MR. LINCOLN'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

To the Editor of The Springfield, (Mass.) Republican:—

The fatalistic views, ascribed to the late President Lincoln by Mr. Herndon, are sufficiently contradicted by the circumstance that, when about leaving his home to enter upon his duties as president, he humbly implored, as is well known, an interest in the prayers of his townsmer, neighbors and friends, that he might be divinely assisted in the discharge of his most responsible duties. Moreover, it is also well known by those who knew Mr. Lincoln intimately, as did Bishop Simpson, for example, that Mr. Lincoln's religious views underwent a considerable change in connection with the death of his little Willie. It is a remarkable fact that these cold and barren negations, ascribed, we think falsely, to Mr. Lincoln in his later days, can never stand the test of trial,—the stress of great responsibility upon the one hand, and of disappointment and bitter loss upon the other,—can never satisfy the human heart when smarting under the sense of bereavement. What better evidence can be required that they cannot be in accordance with, or founded upon the truth of God? R. H. H.

WHO LET HER?—"If a woman wants to chop wood, why let her."—Horace Greeley.

Already comments upon this text have appeared in your paper, on reading which, this question suggests itself: Who, or what is to let her?

Is it the laws of the land? Is it public opinion? Is it woman's husband as her nearest male relative? or is it Horace Greeley? Perhaps he'd be glad of the chance. I hope he will be gallant enough to turn round and wash the dishes.

There is a great deal implied in the giving of the gracious permission. When a woman chops wood, she does it of her own free will, and nobody lets or hinders, most especially no one hinders. Women that labor don't generally experience any difficulty of that kind; nobody hinders them from doing all that they possibly can, and that of the hardest kind of work, too. Women already have such liberties. If Horace Greeley imagines that he can grant even this questionable privilege, he is mistaken. I don't believe it is possible for him even to grant to Mrs. Greeley the privilege of chopping wood; she would very likely find a substitute; as some of the men did when military duty was permitted. It would no doubt be very flattering to his vanity, if he really had the power to let women chop wood, but then he hasn't, you see.—Mrs. H. S. Brooks, in the N. Y. Revolution.

Cambridge, Mass., where the great clamor was made two years ago about whipping in the public schools, and corporal punishment was abolished, has wisely come to the conclusion to allow the teachers to exercise a discretion in the matter under modified rules.—Boston Commonwealth.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, West Newton, Mass.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Third Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on the 26th and 27th of May.

The business session will be held on Thursday, the 26th, at 3 P. M., in some hall to be designated hereafter.

On Friday, the 27th, there will be a general Convention with three sessions in Tremont Temple, for addresses and discussions.

The morning session, beginning at 10 A. M., will be devoted to setting forth the Principles and Aims of the Free Religious Association.

The afternoon session, beginning at 3 o'clock, will be given to a discussion of the question of the Relation of Religion to the Free School System in America, including the topics of the Bible in the Public Schools and the Use of Public Money for Sectarian Schools.

The evening session, 7½ o'clock, will be appropriated to the consideration of the Sympathy of Religions and the Grounds on which they may come into Unity and Co-operation, including the practical problem of the Chinese and their Religion in America.

The names of essayists and speakers will be announced hereafter.

Let the friends of the Association throughout the country gather in strong force at this Annual Convention.

COME TO THE MEETING.

A good deal of interest is being expressed in the approaching Annual Meeting, and the occasion promises to be one of great importance in the history of the Association. We hope the members and friends of the Association, especially those from a distance, will make a strenuous effort to be present. The Free Religious Association is no "Boston notion," no coterie of social or intellectual aristocracy; it is American and democratic. It represents principles for the establishment of which America opens a grand field. Particularly do we hope that all those who think that the Association is not doing so much work as it ought to do, will be present at this meeting. Let them come and state their reasons and their plans. The business session on Thursday the 26th, will give the opportunity. We hope for important results from that session.

Meantime the Committee of Arrangements are securing excellent speakers for the Convention in Tremont Temple on Friday. From the foregoing Notice it will be seen that topics of the greatest interest and moment are then to be discussed. Octavius B. Frothingham, the President of the Association, will make an address to open the topic of the morning session. Wm. Lloyd Garrison, we confidently expect, will read in the afternoon an Essay on the Relation of Religion to the Free School System in America. Samuel Johnson, preacher to the Free Church in Lynn, has consented to give the Essay on the evening subject,—the Sympathy of Religions and the Grounds on which they may come into unity and co-operation. Rev. Dr. Wise of Cincinnati, one of the progressive Jewish Rabbis and a Director in the Association, announces that he will surely be present this year to speak for the universal and progressive elements of Judaism. He writes: "I had already made up my mind to be present at the next meeting of the Association, when your kind invitation only prompted me to leave here on the 15th to be surely in attendance." We hope that others among our Cincinnati friends will come with him. Cincinnati especially ought to contribute a strong voice to the afternoon discussion. Will not Mr. Vickers come to bear his energetic testimony? And here, too, is another opportunity for Mr. Mayo, if he will take it, to present his side of the argument. Other speakers than those here announced have been engaged on some one or other of the topics that are to be considered, but we defer their names till next week, when we expect to be able to give a complete list.

RELIGION OF THE NORTHMEN.

The following is a good summing up of the religious faith of the Northmen, taken from Prof. Rudolph Keyser's book on the subject translated by Barclay Pennock. The resemblance in moral substance to the popular theology, or mythology, of Christianity is too obvious to be pointed out. The Norse faith has the advantage, however, in giving the final victory to Good. Its philosophy of creation seems, too, to contain a sort of rude guess of the nebular hypothesis and the development theory.

"By the reciprocal action of heat and cold was the first unorganized but powerful World-mass produced, as a sharpless Jotun-form. From this mass through a series of developments came forth higher powers, which, by the power of Spirit, overcame the rude Giant-mass, and out of it created Heaven and earth, the actual world with its inhabitants, including mankind.

"The Gods, or Æsir, are these ordaining powers of Nature clothed in personality. They direct the world which they created; but beside them stand the mighty goddesses of Fate, the great Norns, who uphold the world structure, the all-embracing tree of the world.

"The World-life is a struggle between the good and light Gods on one side and the offspring of chaotic matter, the Jotuns, Nature's disturbing powers on the other. This struggle reaches also into man's being. The spirit went forth from the Gods, the body belongs to the Jotun-world; the two powers contend with each other for dominion. Should the spirit gain the victory through virtue and bravery, man ascends to Heaven after death in order to fight in contest with the Gods against the powers of Evil; but if the body triumphs and links the spirit to itself by weakness and low desires, he then sinks down after death to the Jotun-world in the abyss and joins in with the evil powers in the combat against the Gods.

"This struggle of the World-life shall end in a final battle, in which the contending powers naturally destroy each other, and the world which the Gods created is involved in their destruction. But it shall come forth again more glorious and purified. An eternal God, greater than all Æsir, shall arise as its ruler and the austere judge of departed souls.

"The whole is a struggle between Light and Darkness, Spirit and Matter, Virtue and Vice—a struggle which shall end in the triumph of Good over Evil."

The Daily Advertiser says a missionary in India lately preached on the subject of faith, illustrated by the story of Abraham and Isaac, with such magnetic eloquence that one of his native hearers immediately went home and slaughtered his son and offered him to "the big God" as a sacrifice.

COPY OF AN EPITAPH IN NEWBURY, MASS.

Here lies in a state of perfect oblivion John Adams, who died Sept. 2d, 1811, aged 79. Death has decomposed him, and at the general resurrection Christ will recompose him, when perception and thought shall resume their several functions, and he shall become identically the same person which Deity composed him, and shall be happy or miserable according to his dispositions.

O tempora, O mores! The Sultan gives to the Pope an excellent lesson. A dispatch from Constantinople of the 4th inst. informs us that the Turkish government has given to those priests that have been excommunicated by the Pope, the use of a grand mosque, for the purpose of divine worship. A greater parody on "the religion of love" the world has hardly ever witnessed. The chief of the confessors of the "Anti-Christ" opens his "porte" to the heretics, whom "the infallible" expels through a rear gate. In the proud structure of the Church of St. Peter one stone after the other is loosened; but St. Peter is "the rock," and a rock has no heart.—New Yorker Democrat.

CONSCIENTIOUS SCRUPLES.—A man entering a druggist's shop at Bilston, where lay a petition in favor of arbitration instead of war, was asked by the shopman if he would sign it. "No," was the reply, "I am a Wesleyan, and will not sign it, because it is against the Bible." "Indeed, how do you make that out?" "Why, the Bible says there shall be 'wars and rumors of wars,' and I won't sign it."

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

CONSCIENCE.

The absolute condition of all moral life is spiritual freedom. Without this, there can be no such thing as conscience. If man is indeed, as many claim, in all his acts and impulses the necessary consequent of an interminable series of antecedents, the sense of responsibility and moral merit or demerit which now plays so important a part in the drama of his consciousness is purely delusive. Unless the profligate, the defaulter, the murderer, has violated an inward law which forbids his crime, and which he had the power to heed if he had only chosen to heed it, then the sentiment of moral indignation is as irrational as the impulse which makes the boy with a bumped head turn and kick the door that bumped it. Whoever injures me under the influence of a power which he could not possibly resist, is no subject either for blame or remorse; he is as innocent as a brick which tumbles from a scaffolding and crushes my skull, or the timber which gives way in the flooring of a public hall and precipitates me into destruction with a mass of bruised and bleeding humanity. Why complain of the criminal, if his crime is the inevitable result of laws old as the universe and causes co-eval with time itself? The poignant sting of remorse is so much gratuitous misery,—the grand outburst of moral indignation at cruelty, treachery, or injustice, is itself an outrage,—unless it be true that man is master of his own soul, with power to bless or ban according to his will. Whoever accepts the theory that human conduct is a necessary result of foregoing causes, and that the seeming liberty of choice which now makes human responsibility the substratum of all moral consciousness is unreal and illusory, is in consistency bound to expunge from his theory of human nature all recognition of remorse or indignation. It is because these are facts, too obtrusive to be blinked out of sight, that I have never been able to acquiesce in a theory which on account of its simplicity I should gladly adopt. Spiritual freedom I must admit, or else I must deny the distinction of right and wrong. In vain have the advocates of philosophical necessity attempted to reconcile their theory with the existence of moral merit and demerit, of praise and blame, of human responsibility and the realities of spiritual life. Believing that philosophy should have for its aim the explanation of facts, not the construction of partial theories, I must still insist that moral character depends on free obedience or disobedience to an inward law, which, unlike the inviolable laws of chemistry or physics, can be and is daily violated. Whatever becomes of my theory of causation, this fact seems to me incontestable.

Spiritual freedom, then, or the freedom of man to determine his own moral character, is the postulate of all who accept the facts of conscience in their integrity. Among them are these:—

1. That every developed human being perceives the absolute difference between right and wrong in the nature of things.

2. That he recognizes benevolence, justice, purity, truthfulness, and so forth, as right, and their opposites as wrong.

3. That he is conscious of an absolute obligation to do right and shun wrong.

4. That he respects himself whenever he believes he has done right, and condemns himself whenever he believes he has done wrong.

I do not, of course, deny that men differ greatly in the strength and clearness of their moral perceptions; on the contrary, I regard it as a simple truth of observation that these perceptions admit of very different degrees of clearness and strength. In certain men and in certain races, they are very feeble and obscure; but nevertheless they manifest themselves in all save the undeveloped or the imbruted. Every moral being must perceive the fundamental, general distinction of right and wrong, have moral ideas, be conscious of moral obligation, and approve or disapprove his own actions. These are the elementary facts of conscience. Whether conscience is a simple or complex faculty, whether it is to be explained by intuition or association, and so forth, are questions appropriate only to a treatise on ethical science. It is my purpose to deal with conscience only in the simplest manner. All thoughtful persons must be interested in the moral aspects of life; and I content myself now with saying that I regard conscience as that faculty, whether simple or complex, original or acquired, which in the abstract distinguishes right from wrong, generates universal moral ideas, creates the consciousness of moral obligation, and awards self-praise or self-blame according as this obligation is regarded or disregarded in conduct. These are the proper, I think the only, functions of conscience, as made known in human experience; and every theory must recognize them, or leave out of sight the fundamental facts.

Now when we pass from the region of universal moral ideas to the region of specific actions,—that is, when we have admitted that this or that is in general a virtue or a vice, and inquire what particular actions come under these heads respectively,—I think we go beyond the sphere of conscience proper and enter that of pure intellect. Given the distinction of right and wrong which exists between universal moral ideas and their opposites, and the sense of duty which is the root of all self-approbation or disapprobation, it becomes, I think, a question for the reasoning powers to decide what specific acts are right, and what are wrong. Conscience declares that virtue is obligatory, and that certain sentiments, motives and purposes are virtuous; but it is reason which must decide what course of conduct these virtuous motives, sentiments, and purposes require in any given set of circumstances. It is here that men differ most. All men agree, even barbarians, that friends, at least, should be treated kindly, justly, and sincerely. Barbarians may, and do, believe that enemies have no claim to be thus treated; and nations who pass for civilized too often imitate them in this respect. Even among the most enlightened nations, war is the suspension of almost all moral obligations between the belligerent parties; and this is its great and sufficient condemnation, rendering it, in all cases but those of absolute self-defence, an evil not to be endured. But we see here no denial of the virtuousness of benevolence, justice and truthfulness,—only a limitation of their universality. Hence I judge it an accurate analysis to say that these virtues are recognized as such by the conscience of all moral beings even partially developed. The real discrepancies and discordances come in, when the question concerns special acts under special circumstances; and this is a question which only reason can settle.

Allow me to offer an illustration. That truthfulness is a virtue, at least among friends, I think no human being worthy of the name will deny. Yet if, during the critical illness of a friend, some terrible disaster happens, the knowledge of which would in all likelihood make the illness fatal, it becomes a question whether truthfulness requires that the fact should be revealed on inquiry by the sick person, or whether a falsehood may be innocently told for the sake of saving life. This is a real, not an imaginary case. Even among conscientious persons, different conclusions will be formed and avowed. Is it not plain that, in a case like this, the difference in the conclusion is due to a difference of reasoning, and not of moral purpose? One person says it is right to lie under such circumstances: another that it is wrong. I believe the disagreement is intellectual, not moral. The one feels more keenly the obligation of truthfulness; the other, that of benevolence; and in a conflict of duties, it is often a matter of the extremest difficulty to conclude which duty is paramount. The same virtuous and upright intention will dictate different courses of conduct to different persons, according to their degree of mental enlightenment and the general bias of their education. This illustration will, I think, show what I mean by saying that reason, and not conscience, decides what special actions are demanded in special cases involving the application of moral ideas.

The same question may here suggest itself to your minds which was started some months ago in our Radical Club, when Mr. Alcott was present,—namely, is there no infallible criterion of right and wrong, to be found in every human soul? No universal moral standard, prescribing to all alike the same absolute duty under every possible change of circumstances? If it is really true that men may differ conscientiously in so extreme a case as that of the absolute duty of truthfulness, what, it may be asked, is the worth of conscience, and what dependence is to be placed upon it? If conscience tells one man to speak the truth and another man to tell a lie, what becomes of the eternal Right?

Now there is some confusion in the question thus put. I should say that conscience ordains that the truth should always be spoken, that benevolence should always be practised, that justice should always be done. These are unquestionably the dictates of conscience; and conscience certainly suggests no exceptions to her own universal rules. But in a case like that which I just supposed, when the two duties of truthfulness and of benevolence are brought into direct conflict, what ought to be done? Conscience cannot declare that either duty may be neglected; yet one must be. Truthfulness must be sacrificed to benevolence, or benevolence to truthfulness. Now I contend that, in such a case as this, the decision lies, not with conscience, but with reason. The purpose must be clear and pure, to do what duty requires; and, since duty conflicts with duty, reason must sit as umpire in the controversy. When reason has given her verdict, conscience has no right to protest, since she would protest against herself. Life is full of such perplexing situations,—cases in which reason must step in to declare in what direction duty, on the whole, must point. It is vain to say that such conflicts of duty cannot occur,—they do occur. Plainly, no absolute criterion or standard exists in the soul, by which all doubt on moral questions shall be escaped. The one eternal, unchangeable, ever audible command of conscience is,—“Do RIGHT!” This command should never be forgotten, never silenced, never stifled by the louder voices of passion or selfish calculation. But when, in the mazes of life's experiences, we come to a fork of the road of duty, and stand bewildered which path to choose, reason steps forward as the only guide we have, and points us to our course. The demands of duty are met, fully met, if at every such crisis we let the uppermost question in our mind be,—“What ought I to do?” If reason is set to answer this question, and not secretly forced to answer the far different questions,—“What do I want to do?” or—“What will it pay to do?” then conscience will bring no reproach to mar our peace, but will acquiesce without remonstrance in the verdict of reason. There is nothing absolute in human life; we have no right to expect, or even ask, an absolute or infallible criterion. Mistakes we often make; in later years we may reconsider the decision of reason, and say,—“If I were to choose again, I should now, under greater light, choose otherwise." But there is no sting, no poison, in the memory of an honest mistake; we regret it, but feel no shame. The only danger is that, in our uncertainty, we let inclination or policy shove reason to one side, and usurp her authority. It is the command of conscience herself, that, when the simple sense of duty fails to guide, we then summon to our aid the strength of our whole intelligence; and conscience herself shall ratify our choice.

I may now state a principle which before would perhaps have been misunderstood,—namely, that so far as we are concerned the right or wrong of specific actions resides, not in themselves, but in the motives with which we do them. This is the true criterion by which we must be judged. Measure every man's goodness by the fidelity with which he obeys his own ideal. His ignorance is not his fault. There is, no doubt, an absolutely best course in every bewildering emergency; but no man is always wise enough to perceive it. We are not able to rise above the conditions of our life; and whatever mistakes are due to these, will never be laid at our door as crimes. Provided we always seek to follow, under all circumstances, the noble and upright course, there is no censure to dread in heaven or on earth. Men may indignantly condemn or insolently despise us; but we bear about our souls an armor against which the bullets of their reproach or scorn shall fall, harmless and flattened, to the ground.

At the same time, the need of wisdom to re-inforce our virtue is beyond the power of words to over-state. It is a sad sight to see a good man,—a man whose spirit and purposes are spotless as the snow,—ignorantly doing what all enlightened minds perceive to be in violation of great principles. There is but one sadder sight than this,—to see a man guilty of the same violation of great principles, but with conscious ill intent. We call the former a fanatic,—the latter we must call a malefactor. It is difficult for those who clearly perceive the equity and truth of the violated principles to make the due allowance for him who conscientiously violates them; yet to make this allowance is not the exercise of a gushing charity, but rather of the coolest and most unsentimental justice. Let me take, as illustrations, the pagan persecutor of the Christians, Marcus Aurelius, and the Christian persecutor of heretics and Jews, Torquemada, the Grand Inquisitor of Spain under Queen Isabella. Both these men were sincere in the highest degree, and of unsullied private character. Marcus Aurelius was the best emperor, perhaps, that ever sat on the throne of the Cæsars,—a man of whom Dean Milman, the historian of Christianity, has said:—"With Aurelius, Christianity found not only a fair and high-minded competitor for the command of the human mind, not only a rival in the exaltation of the soul of man to higher views and more dignified motives, but a violent and intolerant persecutor." It is indeed a saddening thought that the author of perhaps the finest writings of the Stoical School of Rome, which are filled with the purest and sublimest sentiments, should have been driven by a mistaken sense of duty to persecute his fellow-men for no crime but their belief. There is no reason to doubt that Torquemada was equally sincere, if Prescott has truly painted his character; yet over a hundred thousand persons, in the eighteen years of his ministry, were punished for heresy, nearly nine thousand of whom were burned.

Cases such as these show how dependent conscience is, for its application, on mental enlightenment. The fault of these men was only the fault of their age, and of the systems under which they had been educated. The correct apprehension of great principles will alone save the world from the curse of well-intentioned but ignorant rulers. In judging of the private character of such men as these conscientious persecutors, we must remember only their fidelity to their own convictions of duty, determined by unenlightened reason; but in judging of the absolute character of the deeds they committed, we must remember only the sacred principles they trampled, however ignorantly, under foot. They were both fanatics,—that is, so far as persecutors, sincere and conscientious enemies of the human race. The reason which taught them how to apply their sentiments of duty to real life was woefully darkened by superstition; and the result was vast and appalling misery to mankind. It would have been worse for them, but better for the world, if they had had less earnestness and conscientiousness in the discharge of a terribly perverted sense of right. Or rather it would have been better, both for them and for the world, if the strength of their conscience had been equalled by the enlightenment of their reason.

The conclusions to which we have come will throw some light upon a question often asked,—“Has there been any moral progress of the race?”

“Morality,” says Sir James Mackintosh, “admits no discoveries. No improvements have been made in practical morality. The facts which lead to the formation of moral rules are as accessible, and must be as obvious, to the simplest barbarian as to the most enlightened philosopher. The case of the physical and speculative sciences is directly opposite. From the countless variety of the facts with which they are conversant, it is impossible to set any bounds to their future improvement. It is otherwise with morals. They have hitherto been stationary; and in my opinion they are likely forever to continue so.” Mr. Buckle advocates the same view of the unprogressive character of morals. He admits the fact of human progress, but regards it as solely intellectual. “The child born in a civilized land,” he says, “is not likely, as such, to be superior to one born among barbarians; and the difference which ensues between the acts of the two children will be caused, so far as we know, solely by the pressure of external circumstances; by which I mean the surrounding opinions, knowledge, associations, in a word, the entire mental atmosphere in which the two children are respectively nurtured. On this account it is evident that, if we look at mankind in the aggregate, their moral and intellectual conduct is regulated by the moral and intellectual notions prevalent in their own time. There are, of course, many persons who will rise above these notions, and many others who will sink below them. But such cases are exceptional, and form a very small proportion of the total amount of those who are nowise remarkable for good or for evil. An immense majority of men must always remain in a middle state, neither very foolish nor very able, neither very virtuous nor very vicious, but slumbering on in a peaceful and decent mediocrity, adopting without much difficulty the current opinions of the day, making no inquiry, exciting no scandal, causing no wonder, just holding themselves on a level with their generation, and noiselessly conforming to the standard of morals and of knowledge common to the age and country in which they live.”

Mr. Mill, on the other hand, believes in a progressive morality. “The contest,” he says, “between the morality which appeals to an external standard, and that which grounds itself on internal convictions, is the contest of progressive morality against stationary, of reason and argument against the deification of mere opinion and habit.” Mr. Lecky, also, argues on the same side of the question. “Men come into the world,” he says, “with their benevolent affections very inferior in power to their selfish ones, and the function of morals is to invert this order. The extinction of all selfish feeling is impossible for an individual, and, if it were possible, it would result in the dissolution of society. The question of morals must always be a question of proportion or of degree. At one time the benevolent affections embrace merely the family, soon the circle expanding includes first a class, then a nation, then a coalition of nations, then all humanity, and finally its influence is felt in the dealings of man with the animal world. In each one of these stages a standard is formed, different from that of the preceding stage, but in each case the same tendency is recognized as virtue.” And again he says:—"At this point I may observe how completely fallacious is the assertion that a progressive morality is impossible upon the supposition of an original moral faculty. To such statements there are two very simple answers. In the first place, although the intuitive moralist asserts that certain qualities are necessarily virtuous, he fully admits that the degree in which they are acted upon, or in other words the standard of duty, may become progressively higher. In the next place, although he refuses to resolve all virtue into utility, he admits as fully as his opponents that benevolence, or the promotion of the happiness of man, is a virtue, and that therefore discoveries which exhibit more clearly the true interests of our kind may throw new light upon the nature of our duty.”

Now the chief facts in the case seem to be these:—

1st. Wherever any moral life manifests itself at all, benevolence, justice, truthfulness, and so forth, are recognized as virtues; and in proportion as their obligation is felt, and their universality acknowledged, in the same proportion is moral life enhanced in degree. In fact, until these are seen to be virtues, as may have been the case with the pre-historic men of the cave-period, morality is impossible.

2nd. If the Development Theory is true, a gradual evolution of moral life out of a previous non-moral condition must be assumed. In trying to prove or disprove the moral progress of mankind, the mistake is often made of contrasting periods too near each other in point of time. A larger comparison, as for instance of modern Europe with the Europe of the Stone Age, will leave no doubt whatever of an actual improvement of moral condition.

3rd. The law of inheritance by which offspring are born with the improved physical and mental characteristics of their parents, renders it altogether improbable that improved moral characteristics should not be transmitted. Mr. Buckle's supposed equality of moral capacity between the child of civilized and the child of barbarian parentage, is contrary to all analogies of inheritance in other respects. Virtuous impulses, tendencies, and habits are strengthened in the individual by obedience to conscience; and according to analogy there is no reason why this increase should not favorably affect his children, and be reckoned as one of the causes of their subsequent moral superiority.

4th. Conscience appears as an elemental fact of human nature, so far as known in history; and its increased relative power over individual conduct is, all things considered, the best criterion of true civilization. In the highest state of society, moral motives are most powerfully felt. It is true that no moral discoveries may have been made for centuries; but moral ideas are more influential to-day than ever before in large social and political affairs: Mr. Buckle sees the permanence and simplicity of elementary moral ideas; but he overlooks their ever-greatening influence upon mankind. The elevated tone of literature, the increase of the philanthropic spirit, the broader foundation of political life, and so forth, contrast strikingly with the state of society in these respects only a few hundred years ago.

From these and similar data we conclude that a moral progress of mankind is plainly perceptible, manifesting itself in two aspects,—in the greater power of moral ideas over the race, and in their wiser application to practical problems. Conscience grows more and more mighty in its enforcement of moral motives; and reason grows more and more sagacious in the direction of these motives into truly beneficial channels. It is vain to seek to disconnect the moral and the intellectual elements of human progress. It is not science alone that advances; it is not merely human intellect, but Man himself, that improves,—Man, with his boundless possibilities,—Man, with his feet in the mire and his head in the skies,—Man, armed with a strength of brain that tames the wild forces of material Nature, and crowned with a conscience that makes him one with the Open Secret of the universe.

Miscellaneous.

UNORTHODOX LONDON.

A Sunday Lecture by Professor Huxley.

[From the London Daily Telegraph.]

When first I commenced these heterodox effusions—at once the evidence and history of my own wanderings out of the ordinary grooves and ruts of “orthodox” ideas—and while I was still lingering near the North Pole of Unorthodoxy, I mentioned, in passing, my visit to St. George's Hall on a Sunday afternoon to hear Dr. Carpenter lecture on “The Deep Sea.” The fact of my having received a circular from the “Sunday Lecture Society,” containing a statement of their past operations and projected work, shows me, not only that the work whose commencement I then chronicled is still going on, but that it is progressing with every sign of success, and endorsed with names of approvers so eminent as scarcely to allow of its being passed over in silence in a series of papers professing to represent the present phases of religious life in London. Besides the world-known name of Professor Huxley, the lecturer for the day, I found such names as Dr. Spencer Cobbold, Professor Blackie, and Erasmus Wilson among the forthcoming lecturers; while, as though to remove any doubts as to the “propriety” of devoting a Sunday to science instead of religion, specially so called—for may not the two be made synonymous?—I descried two “reverend” titles among the lecturers. Rev. Allen D. Graham, M. A., Oxon (described in “Crockford for 1868” as Curate of St. Paul's, Covent-garden), is to enlighten the audience Sunday next, April 10, on “Witchcraft, and the Lessons we learn from it;” Rev. Professor Lewis Campbell, M. A., Oxon (described as formerly Tutor of Queen's College, Oxford, and Vicar of Milford, Hants, now Professor of Greek in the University of St. Andrew's), is also announced, though without his subjects being named. Need I say that these reverend titles removed any lingering scruples, and that I resolved to make Professor Huxley my preacher for the day? In sober earnest, this Sunday Lecture Society is now a fait accompli, and demands notice. A few years ago, such an institution would have been deemed an impossibility. We may well ask, then, as

Mr. Bellew does ask three times every week from that very rostrum :

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special notice?"

Right or wrong, this thing should be known. The circular of the society says—and I believe truly—"The committee have spent, since the month of December, upwards of £70 merely in advertising in the newspapers. No fewer than 6,000 circulars, containing the list of persons approving the objects of the society, and 16,000 of the handbills announcing the present series of lectures, have been printed and distributed. Yet, notwithstanding this, the committee believe that the society's lectures are but little known of (sic) by residents in London, or even in the immediate vicinity of St. George's Hall." Repeating my original cautelâ, then, that my mission is simply to describe, not to criticise or pronounce for or against, I give the records of this experience in the scientific portion of "Unorthodox London."

The subject chosen by Professor Huxley was, "The Forefathers of the English People on the Mainland of Europe and Asia." He commenced by calling the attention of his audience to the two types of physique noticeable at the present day in Britain—the one tall and fair and light-haired, the other short and dark, with curling black hair. Passing over the gradations obtained by intermixture, he found that these two types were existent in the earliest accounts of Britain—those, namely, of Cæsar, Tacitus, and Strabo—when accounts of Britain stood in much the same relation to the Romans as Captain Cook's account of Tahiti to us. Cæsar tells us of the fair-haired inhabitants of Kent; Tacitus mentions the dark Silures of South Wales. In a linguistic point of view the peoples were one; for English were non-existent, and there were only the two types of Celtic—the Cymric and Gaelic. The two races then were one, and the problem is, whence came these two races with one language? Geography gives a suggestion. The East Coast of England is separated by a brief space of sea from Scandinavia, Denmark, North Germany, and the North of France. In the same way the south and south-east of England are separated by a still smaller space from France. Now, we may check the obvious inference deducible herefrom by noticing the distribution of races on the Continent. It would be possible, Professor Huxley observed, to draw an oblique line from the mouth of the Seine to the mouth of the Rhone, and divide the tall, fair people north of that line from the short, dark people south of it. This fact is confirmed by the statistics of stature drawn up for purposes of the conscription. Such a line might, in fact, extend from the north of Ireland to the Himalayas, and still to the north would be the tall fair people, and to the south, the short dark. Such a difference was not traceable to climate, because still further north you come again upon dark people, to wit:—the Laps, a Mongolian race quite distinct from the dark people of the south. The Eur-Asiatic continent may, then, be divided into three zones or belts:—1, the dark Laps; 2, the fair Celts; 3, the dark Celts. The distinction comes to be, then, between the Xanthochroi, or tall and fair, and the Melano-chroi, or dark. The inference, therefore, was, that these two divisions of Celts came from the continent to our island. The invasions of the Saxons, Jutes, Danes, and Northmen changed the language of Britain, but added no new physical element. Therefore, argued the Professor, we must not talk any more of Celts and Saxons, for all are one. "I never lose an opportunity of rooting up that false idea that the Celts and Saxons are different races." If Professor Huxley could only get Pat to recognize this, he might do more to root out Fenianism than the suspension of Habeas Corpus or any amount of Church and Land Tenure Bills!

Professor Huxley went on to prove the identity of the Gauls and Germans in the earliest historical times. Both were a fair-haired race, of tall stature and powerful frame. He compared their habits, going into some amusing details—for instance, these Celts were eminently a trouser-wearing race. Gaul was divided into Braccata and Togata—the former Celtic, the latter Roman. The Highland costume of the present day, therefore, was eminently unnational. It was Roman, not Celtic. The Germans, too, were the earliest known possessors of soap; proving again—as in their adoption of trousers—their superiority over the Romans. Possibly, however, the soap was used rather as an ornament than for purposes of cleanliness, to redden the hair—a process still adopted in the Fiji Islands. The hypothesis finally advanced was that the tall fair people north of the line above mentioned, breaking through the natural barriers of the Alps, Carpathians, and Hercynian forest in Europe, as through the Himalayas in India, dispossessed and virtually exterminated the dark people to the south, driving them into mountain districts, as the Britons were afterwards driven by successive invaders into Cornwall and Wales. The dark people are the remains of the southern mountaineers, sometimes, as in the case of the Basque people, proving their separate origin by linguistic peculiarities, whilst the resemblance of Sanscrit, Latin and Greek, and modern European languages attest the supremacy of the nomadic inhabitants of the northern plains, across which, Professor Huxley observed, "you might drive a cart for 4,000 or 5,000 miles from Holland to China without encountering any elevation worth speaking of." So, then, the upshot is, we are all one people, and, as was quaintly said, "it is wicked to talk about Anglo-Saxons." Teuton and Celt are distinctions without a difference from this time forth and for evermore.

The audience was a very large and intelligent one, comprising many eminent and scientific men, quite a fair quota of ladies, a sprinkling of the rising generation, and altogether a collection of heads that would have delighted a phrenologist or physiognomist. Surely there is another old prejudice that must be rooted up by such a gathering as this. Whatever else we may be called, the English people must no longer be set down as a race of unmitigated Sabbatarians.

It is against this, and this only, that the Sunday Lecture Society desire to protest. They are not a Church, like the body that gathers in the same hall later in the day, and calls itself "The Church of Progress." They carefully avoid all theological subjects; but hold that "History, Literature, and Art, especially in their bearing upon the improvement and social well-being of mankind," are proper subjects for Sunday study. It would be difficult to assail such a position—very difficult to say where the practical sermon merges into the lecture. Then, again, the persons who attended the Sunday lecture, one could see at a glance, were not the people who go to church or are likely to do so until the calibre of the clergy and the style of the sermons are widely different from the present. Mr. Conway's congregation, as well as Mr. Conway himself, and several leading Unitarians, were present; but those who are familiar with Unitarian sermons, or with Mr. Conway's discourses, will be aware there is but an ill-defined frontier line between them and a lecture by Professor Huxley. It will probably take some time to familiarise the present generation with Sunday lectures. There will be need of caution lest Dum fugiant stulti, vitia in contraria currant.

We do not want the Continental Sunday in London. In fact, despite all their small scorn of our Sabbatarianism, our continental neighbors are to a large extent adopting and appreciating our English "Lord's Day." But there is a wide difference between opening theatres and music-halls on Sunday, and opening museums and giving lectures on science and kindred subjects. Probably all, except very extreme religionists, will agree that, next to going to church, attending such a lecture as the one I have sketched above is a legitimate mode of spending Sunday; indeed, we may yet see the day when even those who go to church in the morning, and perchance the evening too, may still find time in the afternoon for such an interesting disquisition as the one I listened to on the subject of our forefathers in the olden time.

"SMALL SUMS."

When I was quite a small boy, I had a craving ambition to see my name in print. The name once published to the world by means of type and printer's ink, seemed to my ardent and inexperienced mind to be fame itself. But I could see no way of coming before the public. The writings of a boy ten years old are not greedily sought after by publishers, as a general rule; and it was in vain that I submitted sheet after sheet of very profound observations on men and things, as seen from the limits of an indulgent grandmother's apron-string, with trembling hands to my uncle, who published a paper. My uncle was a "great smoker;" and it was generally my sole satisfaction to find my most elaborate productions merely glanced at, pronounced "very good," and immediately converted into pipe-lighters. My grandmother, good soul, was the only mortal that recognized and applauded my amazing genius; and I have not a doubt but that she thought me capable of anything in a literary point of view, from a love-letter to a Commentary on the Pentateuch. All my efforts to come into print proved unavailing. But one day, happening to get hold of the report of some religious missionary society, I saw that there was a long list of donors and subscribers published at the end of the book. I actually knew some of the persons whose names were there inserted. Here was an opening for me. I immediately set at work collecting all the pennies I could; and saving them up till I got a sum of about fifty cents, waited for the collectors to come round again, when I gave my money and wrote my name in full. Anxiously did I await the "Report;" at length in came the blue-covered pamphlet that was to hand my name down to posterity. Eagerly did I open it, nervously did I read over all the names from beginning to end, but mine was not there; and it was with a heavy heart I came to the conclusion that the only part of the book which bore any reference to me was "Small Sums, $5." I was now a sadder but a wiser boy; determined not to be baffled again, I resolved to get out of the small sum contributors next year. Accordingly, with a good deal of begging, and saving, and self-denial, the next report not only had my name in full, but the word "Master" before it, and one dollar after it!

Since I have seen more of the ways of the world, I have discovered that a great many "old boys," with gray hair, even, are particularly anxious not to have their names buried among the "small sums," whenever they give their money for charity or religion!—Harry Bolingbroke.

AN EXCELLENT SUBJECT.—In all policies of life-insurance these, among a host of other questions, occur:—"Age of father, if living; age of mother, if living." A man in the country who filled up an application, made his father's age "if living," 112 years, and his mother's 102. The agent was amazed at this showing, and fancied that he had got an excellent subject; but feeling somewhat dubious, remarked that the man came of a very long-lived family. "Oh, you see, sir," replied the applicant, "my parents died many years ago, but 'if living,' would be aged as there put down." "Oh, I see," said the agent, as he indulged in a most unaccountable fit of laughing.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I shall, to the very best of my remaining energies, help everybody to attain woman suffrage, though I shall never join any society to that end. But it seems to me the proposal you make, had it preceded instead of coming after Mr. Tilton's and his friends', would be open to less objection than that, without loss of any of its advantages. I hope yours will be approved in Boston, heartily, religiously, as the other is rejected; and if it is, then I should say, let it go into immediate effect. If it be not judged worthy of Boston acceptance, then I should say, let that inaugurated at the Fifth Avenue Hotel Conference be as promptly submitted to as many of the friends of woman's enfranchisement as possible; and, if generally approved, let that become the basis of their future action. And I am sure it will soon command the respect and approval of all who prefer principle to party, and the good of the cause to their own selfish gratification and aggrandizement. And the good or ill will of any others is of little importance one way or the other."

—"For the first time I am truly disappointed in my good friend THE INDEX,—for the first time I have risen from the weekly feast it brings, not merely unrefreshed, but absolutely hungry! True, I have not partaken freely of the cuisine prepared by R. S. D. (which, by the way, is no doubt excellent), for my grief at not finding the usual dainty dish from your 'own cookery' destroyed all relish for anything else. Had I a single crumb of comfort left, I would not complain; but I have distributed my last morsel (even to the SUPPLEMENTS and 'Fifty Affirmations'), and can only console myself, therefore, with the hope, nay belief, that, this week of fasting ended, the desire of my soul shall be satisfied; for surely, Mr. Editor, you will not serve us so again! Increase the price of our rations, please, or reduce the quantity; but preserve, I pray you, the quality intact. Give or withhold whatever else you will, but do not deprive us of our weekly standard dish,—at least until we have gained sufficient strength to do without it." [This was signed "Annie-anonymous;" but a little bird in the air revealed its author—a lady who is personally unknown, but who has proved an excellent friend to THE INDEX.—ED.]

—"Enclosed please find some postal, for which forward to me its worth in INDEXES of Number 17, Vol. 1. I want them to distribute, for the 'Quaker's Letter to the Presbyterian' is the best thing of the season. You will soon have to send fifteen or twenty copies to —, notwithstanding there are three churches there."

LOCAL NOTICES.

THE FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY meets every Sunday morning, at 10½ o'clock, in the church on the corner of Adams and Superior streets. Sunday School at a quarter to 12. The public are cordially invited to attend.

THE RADICAL CLUB will meet at the same place, at 7½ o'clock, May 15. Subject for discussion:—"Is Conscience the result of Education?" The public are cordially invited to attend and participate. At the meeting of May 8, the Articles of Association reported by the Committee appointed for the purpose were adopted by the Club, and will be published in our next issue.

The ladies of Toledo will shortly be visited at their homes in behalf of the ORPHAN'S HOME SOCIETY. The membership fees which it is thus hoped to obtain are needed to meet a debt of $2,000 still due for the grounds and building, and to raise means for defraying the current expenses of the year. The treasury of the Society contains no more than is necessary to pay debts already due for these expenses; and the smallest sums contributed will be gratefully received. The Managers of the HOME hope eventually to make an addition to the present building for the sake of securing a Lying-in Department and a Nursery for foundlings. At present they are unable to receive children under two years of age. They have been already urgently solicited to receive infants deserted by their parents, but have been obliged to refuse on account of the narrowness of their accommodations. Unfortunate women have been cared for, and provided with good homes; and it is desired to do more in this direction than is now possible. The public are earnestly requested to furnish means for carrying out these benevolent objects.

III. IO AND ARGUS.

A hundred eyes in sleepless Argus burn,
 And wake and slumber in their several turn,— Closed two by two in mild, refreshing sleep,
 While all the rest untiring vigil keep.
 Turn as he may, or look where'er he will,
 His watchful gaze beholds sad Io still.
 When brilliant Phœbus pours his dazzling ray,
 Amid the pastures Argus bids her stray,
 Where leaves and herbs (the produce of the field)
 And slimy streams a loathed subsistence yield.
 When sinks beneath the earth his blood-red orb,
 And shades of night his fiery beams absorb,
 Chains undesired her suffering neck surround.
 Her only couch, the inhospitable ground,
 Too often bare, her wretched body pressed,
 And sought, but sought in vain, refreshing rest.
 To Argus she her suppliant arms essayed
 To raise aloft,—in vain the attempt was made;
 And when to move his iron heart she tried,
 Her dumb complaints in mournful lowings died;
 Strange on her ear the startling accents fall,
 And her own tones her sinking heart appall.

The Index.

MAY 14, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

There are three Republican papers in Toledo, two dailies (Blade and Commercial) and one weekly (the Express, in German.) The two dailies are in a state of chronic repulsion, like two pith-balls similarly electrified; or rather, like a couple of indignant storm-clouds, they keep up a mutual bombardment of thunder-bolts, chain-lightning, etc., blinding the eyes of the public and deafening its ears with the majestic volleyings of their wrath. For the sake of terrified humanity, we rejoice at the appearance of a peace-maker,—a veritable lightning-rod, in fact, which we trust will quietly draw the fire of the embattled clouds, and bid

"Silence like a poultice come to heal the blows of sound."

The first number of the Toledo Democrat was issued April 13, in handsome typographical style, to be followed once a week by its successors. Its editor is Mr. John A. Lant, who evidently understands his business, and will doubtless do all that can be done to rally the scattered hosts of his party in Toledo.

The Cincinnati Presbytery has just resolved that no dancing-teacher shall be admitted to its church-membership. We deplore the Presbytery's forgetfulness of the facts that King David "danced before the Lord with all his might" (2 Sam. vi, 14); that the psalmist (cxliv, 3) exhorts the children of Israel to "praise his name in the dance;" that the preacher (Eccl. vii, 4) declares that "there is a time to mourn and a time to dance;" and that various other passages of the Bible take a more cheerful view of the "light fantastic toe" than these grave and solemn presbyters. But, nevertheless, we congratulate the dancing-teachers.

Several excellent communications have been received which we have found it impossible to print as yet for lack of space. Their non-appearance should be regarded as no sign of our want of appreciation, but rather of the necessity of enlarging THE INDEX.

TO OUR FRIENDS.

A gentleman in Georgia writes to us as follows:—

"I have been reading THE INDEX ever since it was issued. I am so much pleased with the matter in general, that I have been thinking how you could double your subscription lists without much trouble. That is, for every one of your subscribers to pay for one extra copy, you furnishing it bound at the end of the year. The character of the articles in your paper makes them worth preserving. Let the price be what the volume will be worth when bound."

Another writes as follows from Oberlin:—

"Send all the back numbers that are in print. If you can obtain the numbers that are out of print by advertising for them, I will give fifty cents extra for the three missing numbers."

A third writes as follows from Boston:—

"I much wish that this publication were in pamphlet for binding, and convenience in reading, lending, and permanent preservation. Particularly, I do hope your articles in Nos. 1 to 6, if no more, can be had in that form."

Such expressions as these occur frequently in the letters we receive; and in order to meet a manifest want, we have devised the following plan, the best that is feasible under the circumstances.

The editions of Nos. 1, 3, and 4 have long been exhausted; and of Nos. 2, 5, 6, 8, and 10, only about two hundred and fifty copies apiece remain. By reprinting Nos. 1, 3, and 4, therefore, we shall be able to furnish by January 1, 1871, two hundred and fifty bound volumes of THE INDEX, complete for the year. It will be impossible to furnish a larger number of volumes than this, without reprinting Nos. 2, 5, 6, 8, and 10,—which would be too expensive, unless we should be assured of a very large demand.

Now if we receive orders for these two hundred and fifty volumes in advance, we will reprint the exhausted editions, and forward the volumes as soon as they can be bound after the expiration of the year. The price will be put as low as possible, namely, at $2.50. No money should be sent at present; but whoever desires to have a complete file of THE INDEX on the above terms should send in his name at once. A list of such names will be kept; and as soon as the requisite number is registered, we shall announce the fact in our columns.

We regret that, to those of our subscribers who lack only a few numbers of THE INDEX, we cannot offer a chance to complete their file without re-purchasing the other numbers for the year; but this is the best we can do under the circumstances. If there are any among them whose subscriptions date from the beginning, and whose files will be completed by receiving Nos. 1, 3, and 4, we request them to send in their names on the announcement that the two hundred and fifty volumes are all ordered. Enough extra copies will be reprinted to meet this additional small demand. From what we have learned of the flattering estimate put upon THE INDEX by our subscribers, we believe that this small number of volumes will speedily be engaged; and we advise all who really wish the first volume complete not to delay sending in their orders. The price will barely enable us to meet the cost involved; and we only make the offer to enable our earnest friends to secure what we have been again and again asked to furnish.

EVANGELICAL EVASION.

The Watchman and Reflector, a Baptist weekly paper in Boston, has the following in its issue of May 5:—

"THE INDEX, Abbot's radical paper at Toledo, is trying to prove that President Lincoln was an infidel. Will the INDEX please explain Mr. Lincoln's request to his townspeople to pray for him, and a few other similar incidents that could be cited?"

THE INDEX is "trying to prove" nothing of the sort. It is chary of epithets. It has simply published an article by Mr. Herndon, showing that Mr. Lincoln did not believe in Christianity as the Watchman and Reflector defines it. Many men believe in prayer who disbelieve the Messiahship of Jesus and the entire "Christian scheme of redemption," as for instance Lord Herbert of Cherbury. The point is not whether Mr. Lincoln was a religious man (which Mr. Herndon expressly asserts), but whether he was a Christian in any sense accepted by the Christian Church. Now the Watchman and Reflector has lately been severely criticising Theodore Tilton for claiming to be a Christian without accepting the common evangelical views of Christianity. If anything can be proved by testimony, it is proved that Mr. Lincoln's views of Christianity were at least as lax as those of Mr. Tilton. Will the Watchman and Reflector please give a straightforward answer to the question, whether Mr. Lincoln was a Christian? A little consistency and candor on this point would be quite refreshing in our "evangelical" exchanges.

THE RADICAL:—A CARD.

The Radical for May will appear late, but is likely to prove an unusually attractive number. Among other articles of interest is a strong paper giving the "Evidences of Spiritualism," by one of its leading exponents, Hudson Tuttle; a review of "Mr. Abbot's Religion," by D. A. Wasson; "The Miracles of the New Testament," by M. H. Doolittle; "A Sermon of Immortality," by the late Everett Finley; and some very appreciative pages on Walt Whitman's Poems, by an English Lady, written to W. M. Rossetti, and introduced to the public in the following letter:—

LONDON, Nov. 20, 1869.

The great satisfaction which I felt in arranging, about two years ago, the first edition (or rather selection) of Walt Whitman's Poems published in England has been, in due course of time, followed by another satisfaction—and one which, rightly laid to heart, is both less mixed and more intense. A lady, whose friendship honors me, read the selection last summer, and immediately afterwards accepted from me the loan of the complete edition, and read that also. Both volumes raised in her a boundless and splendid enthusiasm ennobling to witness. This found expression in some letters which she addressed to me at the time, and which contain (I affirm it without misgiving, and I hope not without some title to form an opinion) about the fullest, farthest-reaching, and most eloquent appreciation of Whitman yet put into writing, and certainly the most valuable, whether or not I or other readers find cause for critical dissent at an item here and there. The most valuable, I say, because this is the expression of what a woman sees in Whitman's Poems—a woman who has read and thought much, and whom to know is to respect and esteem, in every relation, whether of character, intellect, or culture.

I longed that what this lady had written should be published for the benefit of English, and more especially of American readers. She has generously acceded to my request. The ensuing reflections upon Whitman's Poems contain several passages reproduced verbatim from the letters in question, supplemented by others which the same lady has added, so as more fully to define and convey the impression which those unparalleled and deathless writings have made upon her.

W. M. ROSSETTI.

[We believe that no one who reads the Radical will dissent from our opinion, that it is in every respect deserving of support by the liberal public. We most cordially recommend it to our readers.—ED.]

BURR AND WASHINGTON.—In our history, Aaron Burr was a keener thinker than George Washington. He was a far more ingenious man, a far more active man; and if he had been a moral man, and had maintained normal relations with himself, with his fellow men, and with the laws of rectitude, he would have been an abler man. Washington was a man of good sense, but he was not a man of genius in any direction except that of conscience. He was a man of singular equity, of great disinterestedness, and of pure and upright intent. Sagacious he was, by the light which comes from integrity. He endured, having faith to believe that right was right, that right was safe, and that right in the end would prevail. That which made Washington the only great hero of our Revolutionary struggle, was the light of the moral element that was in him—not any intellectual genius which he possessed; nor any rare tact in administration, nor any remarkable executive power. And if you look back upon those names in our history that have best stood the test, you will find that they have been men who were fruitful in the highest moral elements. And as time goes on, those men who lack those elements sink lower and lower till they set below the horizon; and those men who possess them rise higher and higher, till they reach the meridian, with undying splendor to shine upon history and the world.—Beecher.

TITUSVILLE, PA., May 1, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir:—Liberals frequently complain of the treatment meted out to them by the Orthodox. I certainly cannot and will not excuse the latter, for their injustice results from the most reprehensible motives—bigotry and fanaticism. But if they are wrong in this, liberals themselves are not less to blame, and deserve, perhaps, no better treatment, so long as they forget their own dignity so far as to fawn doggishly when some Orthodox condescends to look favorably upon, or speak kindly of or to, a liberal or "infidel," to submit patiently to all kinds of injustice; to suffer humbly indignities heaped upon them, and yet not associate to protect themselves and to maintain their rights. It was, therefore, with no little satisfaction that I read your excellent rejoinder to the Rev. Mr. Howard's article—"The Ambition of Jesus,"—and the scorn [?] with which you refuse to accept his left-handed compliment, that he believes you "honest," though not an Orthodox Christian. Such dignified language as yours, if anything, must eventually overcome the prejudices and arrogance of the "pious" Orthodox, and compel them finally to become just towards, and respect, those who may differ from them dogmatically. Silence—or worse yet, passive, humble submission—certainly never will.

But while I thus rejoice in your just rebuke administered to the Rev. Mr. Howard, I can not very well agree with your views on Immortality, as given in your reply to your correspondent "L. T. I." on "The Problem of Immortality." You there most truly say:—"Whether the soul lives after the body dies, is purely a question of fact." But can we really have any facts in the matter? I think not. All the "facts" obtainable are only the deductions we may make from other and real facts. These prove nothing conclusively, but serve merely as arguments for the theories which we may build, sustaining or rejecting immortality, and on which we may base our belief or disbelief on it. Nothing more. But belief in immortality will no more make it a fact, than disbelief will disprove it; for—"Our doubt will not make us mortal—our belief will not make us immortal," as you not less truly say. Why then, Mr. Abbot, shall "all earnest men and women hope for it?" Must not you yourself admit that "it is not intrinsically desirable?" In every INDEX that I receive, I admire the logic of your reasoning, the candor of your investigations, the fearlessness with which you pronounce your convictions and the result of your studies, and the honesty with which you reject everything that the force of your logic rejects. Like a true man, you refuse "to put desire in the place of reason," but follow in everything the light that is in you. Is it possible, then, that in this question of immortality you should be unlike yourself—follow a phantom, and not that light that is in you?

"Will it pay?" I do not mean in the sense given it by "L. T. I." which implication you so justly and beautifully refuted,—nor, certainly, in a yet more condemnable sense, which your character and manliness forbid; but I mean, whether it will pay to hope for a something of which you say yourself that "we know nothing on the point?" What good will it do to "covet continuance of being," when we know that "thought changes no reality?" Can this hoping against hope make it a reality? Can it give us "continuance of being," or make us happier?

It is rather curious that I should have thus to remonstrate against comments in almost every other respect excellent on "L. T. I.'s" article. I cannot say:—"Now let us be candid, Mr. Abbot!"—for you certainly are most commendably candid,—nor can I say:—"Let us reason a little, my friend!"—for you reason as judiciously as mortal man can. But if I understand this "Problem of Immortality" aright, there can be but two ways to solve it—Science and Experience, the way of the Liberals,—and the Bible, the way of the Believers. But all the "facts" obtained in the first way are that the body dies, is decomposed, changed, but not annihilated; and that the soul is itself a problem. Is it an entity? I believe not; at least, Science and Experience teach us that all the faculties generally ascribed to the "soul" are but those of the brain, a consequence of the activity of our physical mechanism on which they depend, and whose perfection or imperfection (normal or abnormal state) conditions them. Even life itself is thus conditioned; and every individual has it in his power by prudence to prolong it, or by passion, violence, &c., to shorten it, and even to let life (the soul?) out, by opening, for instance, an artery, or by omitting to supply immediately the body, but thus mediately the "soul," with what is indispensable for the sustenance and existence of either. (In consequence of what is considered their mutual relations, but, in fact, of their identity.) Now what is there that can sustain the theory of a "soul" as an entity and its immortality? Yet the foregoing are all, not merely deductions or speculations, but real indisputable facts, established by Science (Anatomy) and Experience. Can, then, mere deductions, speculative theories (Psychology), disprove them? And if clearly not, why yet "hope earnestly for immortality?"

The second way, the Bible, will—all Orthodoxy to the contrary notwithstanding—lead to the same result. [For want of space we are obliged to omit the latter part of the communication, which is addressed to those only who take the Bible as authority,—which we, of course, do not.—Ed.] Thus it will easily be perceived that the belief in immortality has, in fact, nothing to rest on. Science and Experience deny it; and a right understanding of the Bible refutes it. There is nothing that upholds it but the bent given the "mind" by education, the power of habit, and the baneful influence of public opinion. Can you assign other reasons?

I am, sir, with the highest estimation, truly yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

[We must reserve for a future occasion what we have to say at length on the grounds of a rational hope of immortality. We can now only consider very briefly Mr. Einstein's position that Science and Experience absolutely deny all ground for it. So thoughtful and temperate a criticism deserves the most respectful consideration; and we are very glad to publish an article presenting the other side of this great question.]

Mr. Einstein argues that both Science and Experience prove the absolute dependence of mind on brain, and disprove the possibility of mind without brain. This, if we understand his argument, is the substance of it. To this reasoning we reply as follows:—

Experience teaches the constant connection of mind with brain in all its direct manifestations. We deny that it teaches more than this. We deny that it can prove the impossibility of mind without brain, since by its very nature it deals only with what is possible. "Experience of the impossible" would be a contradiction in terms. When we have said that we have no experience of mind but in connection with brain, we have said all that experience warrants us in saying. Anything further is sheer assertion.

Science teaches the absolute dependence of mind on brain for its direct manifestations. We deny that it teaches more than this; and this we unconditionally admit. Whether mind can under other conditions manifest itself without brain, or not, science does not inform us; it deals only with mind under present conditions. Unimagined conditions imply unimagined possibilities. Until science has proved that no conditions are possible but the present ones, she has no right to say anything against immortality. The hope of immortality we cherish rests on moral and philosophical, not on physical data. We deny the logical validity of the disproof as well as of the proof. Science (i. e. physical science) and experience teach nothing whatever on the subject. Mr. Einstein, in our opinion, mistakes the silence of science on this subject for a positive denial. It is facts, of a higher order than those with which physiology or anatomy deals, on which we rest our hope; and we mean to accept the result of a calm, unimpassioned, scientific weighing of them in the scales of reason.—Ed.]

AN AMERICAN RELIGION.

MR. ABBOT:—

Hindustan, Egypt, Judea, Persia, Arabia, Greece, and Rome have all had their peculiar types of religion based on the natural or universal religion; just as a dozen branches grafted on the same tree bear fruits differing from each other in flavor and appearance, but all owing their life to the main trunk. Now why might we not have an American-Western religion that shall be an improvement on these old oriental forms just as the political systems of the Western nations are an improvement on those of the East?

If Religion is the aspiration of the human soul towards its ideals—if the most religious man is he who has the best conceptions of God as a Father, and of man as a brother—if such correct views and feelings modify and give character to a constitution of civil government which accords to men or man all his rights, and blesses more than thirty millions of people, why not call it the American Religion?

The sum of natural religion,—love to God and love to Man,—forms the basis of all civilization, as it does of all the old religions; but governments, laws, physical causes, hereditary customs, wars, have all acted singly or in combination, either to check entirely, to modify, or prevent the development of this sentiment. An English scholar, for instance, in love with learning, and believing that all truth is related, and is divine both in its origin and tendency, would go to Oxford or Cambridge to pursue his studies. But the first thing he had to do before beginning his inquiries was to join the Church of England and swear to the Thirty-Nine Articles. All the old seats of learning in Europe were State institutions; and the Church being united to the State and ruling it, every student had to enter upon the path of investigation with the word Credo on his lips instead of the noble word Skeptomat. Religious mongrelism in Europe owes its ugly look to such causes as these; for true religion has never had a fair chance in the Old World to develop itself symmetrically and naturally. The twig was bent in the early stage of its growth by some pressure from the State or the Church, and it has grown crooked and deformed.

But in this Western world man as man, for the first time in his history, is entirely free. There is public sentiment to be sure, that still dictates Old World modes of belief. But there is no power in this country, as there was in Europe for ages, that carries the Key in one hand and the Sword in the other, and can compel a student to shape his theological, or political, or philosophical opinions to please any set of men. If this public sentiment is often domineering and revengeful toward those who investigate bravely, and express their opinion independently, such public sentiment, as in the Slavery discussion, may be changed. It is not a court of the last resort.

The people of the United States, by adopting the 15th Amendment, have taken away from the Constitution and Laws every objectionable feature. There is no class now in this nation that can feel disaffected to the Government because they are oppressed. No human being under our flag can now complain that he is not absolutely and entirely free to think, to speak, to pursue his happiness in any sphere he pleases. If women as a class feel that they are wronged in not having the Suffrage, all they have to do is as a class to express the wish for it, and it will be granted. These things cannot be said of any other government that has ever existed.

Why not then have an American religion—a religion adapted to man living under a political system which not only declares, but now makes, all men free, and equal before the law; which declares and exemplifies that the preservation of the rights of humanity, civil, religious and political, is the sole end of Laws and Constitutions; and that all governments derive their just powers only from the consent of the governed? These ideas have moulded the American character, notwithstanding the constant influx of Europeans, until it has become gloriously unique. The sons of immigrants who are intelligent and receptive, evince the American bearing in the first generation. The European system of government beggars the people in means and intelligence, and then the European religion doles out to them wretched pity and relief. But the American system adopts the hard practical idea of teaching every man to stand on his own legs and be independent. Under it warm-hearted benevolence does not exhaust itself in alleviating the miseries of the unfortunate, but by knowledge and right training prevents men from becoming unfortunate. By the guarantee of absolute personal freedom to every man born, our system develops the religious character of its people in a way that justifies me in saying that we ought to have a type of religion which the world will recognize and admire as the American religion; in other words, practical Christianity, in opposition to dogmatic, consisting of Love to God and obedience to all his commands natural and moral, and love to man as a brother. Perhaps Free Religion will grow into this. BEZA.

THE BIBLE ON WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

BY MRS. ———.

From the time when Galileo was forced to recant his theory of the earth's motion, to later days when scientific men have demonstrated satisfactorily to every thoughtful mind that the Creation could not have been completed in six days, that a universal deluge was impossible, and that man, instead of falling from a high estate to his present condition, probably has arisen from a position scarcely superior to that of the brutes, the believers in the sacred authority of the Scriptures have entered continual protest against the claims of Science, and have opposed all progress and growth in ideas on the ground that they aim to overthrow the supremacy of Bible and Church, to disprove God's revelation, and tend to infidelity. This gave rise to some very awkward attempts on the part of devout scientific men to harmonize the two, to explain the Mosaic account, as it is called, in such a way that it should not conflict with what they could not but see was the truth. But the Procrustean bed of Revelation was too short; and as the giant refused to sacrifice his extremities, the dwarf was forced to let him alone. Now, no person of intelligence thinks of disputing the principles of Astronomy, Geology and Natural History, or of attempting to refute them by the first chapter of Genesis, and all such attempts appear absurd. In a few years, when women enjoy more legal rights and a more elevated position than now, as they certainly will, the attempts made at present, to support their claims by the Bible, as also the argument against them therefrom, will appear in a similar light, and we shall then see, if not now, that a book written for the Jews thousands of years ago is not the most reliable guide for Americans in the nineteenth century.

Somewhat more than a year ago, there appeared in one of our papers an address of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton on the Bible and Woman's Rights, the principle arguments of which were repeated in a late address in Toledo, interpreting it favorably to woman's equality with man. I have never seen any reply to it; and, as it embodies about all that can be said on that side of the question, it will serve as a text for what I have to say. In this address, Mrs. Stanton says many good and true things; but they are her own ideas, founded on the principles of right and wrong, and not on the Book which she defends. As long as she argues on general principles, her logic is consistent and her positions good; but when she attempts to support them either by precept or example from the Bible, her argument breaks and falls.

If we accept it as an inspired book, the infallible word of God and guide to man, we must take it as it is; God's work is never imperfect, therefore we must receive the whole of it. We are not at liberty to say, as Mrs. Stanton does,—“The old dispensation has passed away, and no condition of things, laws or customs, recorded in that ancient system previous to the advent of the Messiah, has any authority to-day; it is all superseded in the Christian civilization." If we take that ground, all the Old Testament, at least, becomes of no more importance than any other book, and there is no more reason for using it to support any particular doctrine or idea than for using Gibbon's Rome or Macaulay's England. If it be a mere history of ancient peoples and customs, of what significance is it whether it favor woman's suffrage or otherwise? But the persons whom Mrs. S. wishes to reach by her argument are those who do not thus set aside any part of the Scripture; those who maintain that it is all good and true; in fact, the word of God himself. As such let us view it, and I think we cannot avoid seeing that, from first to last of it, woman is regarded as inferior to man. Even before the fall, man was not made for woman, nor were they created for each other, but woman was created expressly for man, as a "help-meet." Nothing is said about man helping woman. After the fall it was much worse, and not only Adam lays the burden of his sin on Eve's shoulder, but God also, saying, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee." And although He gave the dominion of the earth, the animals, fowls and all living creatures to "them," it is not entirely clear that woman was included by the use of the plural pronoun; and if she were, there is no proof of their sharing the reign equally. If that were the original design of the Creator, we can all see to what an extent it has been frustrated in the history of the world. The idea of the law has been the one commonly received—man and woman are one and that one is the man. And he, in addition to the joint dominion over the inferior creations, has enjoyed a special one over woman. "But," continues Mrs. Stanton, "what say you to the curse pronounced on woman? A curse was also pronounced on man. 'In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread.' Now do you find all men trying to get rid of that curse? There was a curse also pronounced on Ham. 'Servant of servants thou shalt be.' But all good men in this country have, for the last century been trying to free Ham from this curse, &c." The great object of many men is to enjoy the blessings and comforts of life without "sweating" for them, but how rarely is it accomplished? How few are relieved from labor, and on how many poor souls and bodies do the necessities of life press with a weight so crushing as almost to render life a burden! No, if a curse was ever pronounced on man it has not yet been revoked—in one way or another an equivalent must be given for what he receives. And Ham was only freed by those good men setting aside the Bible legend and saying—"Cursed or not, he shall be free; the voice of right demands it, and Justice in the end must conquer." The voice inciting them on was one of louder, weightier authority than the mythical tale of a distant land. Woman, if she attain her freedom, must take the same stand. As long as she listens to the voice of tradition and custom, sanctioned by whatever authority aside from that of Eternal Truth, she will fail—lamentably and hopelessly fail.

The Jews were eminently a religious people; in them the worshipping, religious traits predominated over all others. They claimed to live under the direct government of God, administered by His servants, the Prophets, Judges and Priests. The Prophets were considered the mouth-pieces or oracles of Jehovah, and any one assuming to announce a revelation from Him took precedence of all others. This will account for the influence of Deborah, Huldah, Miriam and others referred to as proof that the Bible recognizes woman's equality with man. The word of the Lord might not be rejected, even though expounded by a woman. Moreover we must not take these as examples of the general condition of woman. Probably Mrs. Stanton, Anna Dickinson and a number of other women exert as much influence upon the American mind as these women did upon the Jewish, making proper allowance for the difference of time, circumstances, education, &c. But they are not satisfied—they are demanding more, not only for themselves, but also for their less courageous sisters. If these prophetesses had received and proclaimed a revelation to uplift and help their sister women, to free them from the actual bondage in which they were living, I should consider that something to the purpose. Besides, we cannot tell how much might have been said about their being "out of their sphere;" in a history as concise and brief as that contained in the Bible there would hardly be room to introduce such details. In a history of the United States, in which a period of forty years is crowded into two small pages, we should scarcely receive a description of the Woman's Rights movement or a protest against our female speakers.

The characters of Ruth and Naomi, in their self-reliant independence, their fortitude, their clinging affection for and faithfulness to each other, are really admirable; but the sequel of the story shows how entirely woman was dependent upon man, and that it was considered perfectly proper and right that she should be so.

Of all women spoken of in the Old Testament, Queen Vashti appears the noblest, who valued her own self-respect more than a crown, for she must have known that to disobey her drunken husband was a crime that would not be forgiven her; and her treatment, as well as that of her successor, Esther, shows as plainly as words can tell, that woman was considered as little more than the toy of man, obliged to obey his nod, and tremble at his frown. Yet Vashti was but a heathenish Persian, owing nothing to the elevating influence of the Jewish religion. I never could see that Esther "took a prominent part in all the questions that occupied the court of Ahasuerus," "had an individual opinion on the politics of her day," or "ruled as well as reigned by the side of her king," as Mrs. Stanton avers. My Bible says that she begged at the feet of the king, whither she had ventured in danger of her life, for the salvation of her people; nor could she have the courage thus to venture into his presence until death threatened her and her friends, and her pretty face was all that saved her from the consequences of her daring.

We are all shocked at Anna Dickinson's fervent description of the life of the Mormons, and by the fact that among them the former wife is obliged to give in marriage the new love to her husband, yet the Bible is full of such instances. Did not Sarah thus give Hagar to Abraham? And afterward, when it made discord in her family, send her forth, with her child, into the wilderness? Did not Rachel and Leah give their maids to Jacob? And is there a word said against the immense harems of the Jewish kings? And when Nathan was sent to reprove David for taking Bathsheba for his wife, her husband having been treacherously murdered, the Prophet says nothing of her being wronged, it is only Uriah who is deprived of his rights; the woman is merely a piece of property—has no wish or individuality of her own. You may say, "This was in barbarous times; those ancient customs form no standard for our conduct in these days of Christian civilization." Ah, but those were the days, if we may believe the record, when God sent messages directly to men through His Prophets, and nothing was easier than to know His will. If woman had any rights of her own, and was considered the equal of man, would Nathan have missed so good an opportunity of making it known? But no—David, in spite of all this, we are told, was a man after God's own heart, and Solomon, after leading a most dissolute life, is held up as a model of wisdom and greatness. Who shall say how clamorous the influence of these and other Old Testament polygamists has been upon the condition of woman in succeeding ages?

A FABLE.—As this little parable is sent to a religious paper, we suppose it is thought to have some ecclesiastical significance. But we make no "application":

Farmer D. has a nice little three-cornered lot in which he pastures his calves. It is a selected spot, shaded by a few small trees, enclosed by a good fence, plenty of water in it, and a trough. The young kine have this patch all to themselves, and they can frisk in the sun, lie in the shade, and suck one another's ears just as they please.

One summer afternoon one of the calves put his nose between the rails and looked pityingly at the flocks and herds outside. "If you would only be calves," said he, "you could come in here and be fed, and have a good master, but now you live out on the common with nobody to care for you."

An ox, lying in the shade, glanced curiously at the little fellow, and made answer: "Dear little bossy, this farm is a good deal bigger than you think. In a few months you will grow large enough to come out; and then the farmer will let down the bars, and give you liberty to range over the whole tract."

Bossy looked much puzzled; he could not at once get the idea that the calf-pasture was not the whole farm. He and his brethren have had many anxious discussions on that point. But they keep on growing. They will come out by and by.—Toledo Blade.

One of the most prominent Evangelical clergymen of this city (Chicago) was lately called on by one of his flock, when the following conversation took place:—

"Doctor, I have come to ask leave to withdraw from your church communion."

"And why so, pray?"

"Simply, because I find it impossible any longer to subscribe to the creed. I don't believe in such and such articles" (naming over several).

"Ah! is that all? Well, I don't believe in them myself."

"You surprise me! Why, then, we must both leave the church."

"By no means,—we must both remain, and bring the church to where we stand."

This conversation, which actually took place, expresses the moral attitude of many souls in the orthodox communion.—Christian Register.

An American lady—a Protestant—desired the blessing of Pius IX. upon an armful of beads. "Is that all?" patiently asked the Pope. "Holy Father, your photograph." "Here it is. Anything more?" "Your autograph, if you please, upon the carte de visite." The Pope hesitated a little, but signed nevertheless. "Now is there any other favor you were going to ask?" "O Holy Father, give me, if you will, the pen with which you wrote your name." This was too much even for the Pope's good nature, and he said:—"Yes, take it. Carry away the pen-holder, too. Here, take the inkstand!" The American coolly rolled all the articles up in an old newspaper, carefully placed them in her carpet-bag, and departed with a sweet smile and a reverence to the Pope. "What a great people, nevertheless!" exclaims the Figaro.

It has been ascertained that one square mile in the east end of London contains twenty thousand children, the most uncared for in the community, "receiving no regular instruction"—in fact, gutter-children.

The afternoon session, beginning at 3 o'clock, will be given to a discussion of the question of the Relation of Religion to the Free School System in America, including the topics of the Bible in the Public Schools and the Use of Public Money for Sectarian Schools. The subject will be introduced by an Essay from WM. LLOYD GARRISON, to be followed by free discussion.

The evening session, 7½ o'clock, will be appropriated to the consideration of the Sympathy of Religions and the Grounds on which they may come into Unity and Co-operation, including the practical problem of the Chinese and their Religion in America. Essay by SAMUEL JOHNSON; who will be followed by selected speakers on specific points of the topic, among whom are Col. T. W. HIGGINSON, Rev. WM. H. CHANNING, and Rabbi ISAAC M. WISE.

Let the friends of the Association throughout the country gather in strong force at this Annual Convention.

SPEAKERS FOR THE MEETING.

We have announced above the Essayists and Speakers for the Annual Meeting, so far as positively engaged at the date when we have to make up our department of THE INDEX, which is always more than a week before the issue of the paper. The Committee of Arrangements, however, feel almost as sure of some other names as of those above given. John Weiss, there is every reason to believe, will be among the speakers of the morning session in Tremont Temple. And Mr. Abbot, it is hoped, will be persuaded to come from Toledo to give his word on some one of the points of the topic that is to be presented at that meeting. Negotiations are pending with other writers and speakers of ability.

OUR FRIENDS IN INDIA.

We are most happy to be able to print at this time the following cordial and instructive letter from one of the workers in the Brahmo Somaj of India and a coadjutor of that able and earnest native religious reformer, Keshub Chunder Sen. The latter is now in England on a mission to the British Government, with reference to securing legal protection for the social and religious reforms which he and his friends are laboring to effect. We rejoice to learn from this letter that he may extend his journey to America. We have earnestly invited him to be present and address us at our Annual Meeting. We can hardly hope, however, that he will be able to leave England so soon. It would be a grand feature of our Convention, if he could be at the evening session to speak for the native religious faith and progress of India. We should then have three of the great historic religions of the world personally represented in the Convention,—an earnest of that fraternal spiritual fellowship and faith to which the Free Religious Association is pledged. But to the letter:—

PRATTOHICK, BRAHMO SOMAJ, }
CALCUTTA, 10th March, 1870. }

Rev. Wm. J. Potter, Secretary, Free Religious Association, America:—

DEARLY BELOVED BROTHER:—

In your last letter addressed to our worthy Secretary, Babu Keshub Chunder Sen, you kindly expressed a desire that "we may keep our movements bound together by the tie of regular correspondence;" and in your Annual Report you referred to the non-receipt of any letters from India this year. I believe that the utter absence of leisure which the preparations for Mr. Sen's departure for Europe involved, prevented him from writing to you as frequently as he desired. He is now in Europe, and may possibly cross the Atlantic and have the pleasure of shaking you and the members of the F. R. A. by the hand.

The warm fraternal sympathy, the words of lofty cheer, kindness, good will, and affection which you had sent us, have already stirred feelings of gratitude in the hearts of our brethren; and accustomed as they have been to hear nothing but the language of abuse, slander, and contempt from the Orthodox Christians of this city, your two welcome messages have inspired in them confidence and hope. For the first time in the history of their church, they feel that union in heart and soul and spirit is possible, nay, an accomplished fact, between men born and educated within the pale of Hinduism and of Christianity, but who have outgrown them both. You can scarcely realize the bitter sentiments which our Christian brothers here cherish towards us, and though we are ever ready to extend to them the hand of fellowship and sympathy, we are caricatured by them as the "biggest humbugs in the world." Of the freezing coldness and indifference of the Orthodox Hindu and the active opposition of the Christian bigot, against which we have contended for the last quarter of a century, you can scarcely form an idea in your noble land of toleration. I am aware that your Puritan ancestors hanged Mary Dyer on Boston Common for holding heretical opinions, but I cannot believe they acted then in consonance with the spirit of the great American people. Here, though the British Government will protect us from being hanged or scourged, it cannot set a seal on the tongues of wicked men, whose malicious attacks on paper are "far worse to bear than violence." Your brave words, however, have made us to forget the scant justice which we receive here at the hands of the Orthodox Christians, and have exerted a refreshing and consoling influence on our drooping spirits. Aye, they have strengthened our faith in the ultimate regeneration of humanity throughout the world. More earnestly than ever do we now cherish our fond belief, that one day all distinctions of caste, color, and creed, the bitter feelings of race-antagonism, the deep-rooted rancor of sectarian jealousy, shall give way before the advancing ideas of human brotherhood and universal love; that all polemical contentions shall subside, and all races and kindreds shall merge into one nation, that of humanity,—when the lofty hymns of thanks and trust and love, offered in the great temple of the universe, shall be sung by the Jew and the Gentile, the Christian and the heathen, in one grand chorus. Aye, the day is indeed looming before our vision, in which we shall realize on earth the fabled millennial glory, when the sword shall be turned into ploughshare and spears into pruning-hooks.

You will be happy to learn that our cause is gradually progressing in the Mofussil. Already have several new Brahmo Somajes been planted in the regions of Assam, Furreedpore and Garrow Hills; and we have every prospect of establishing more churches in localities that are sunk in idolatry and superstition. I suppose you are not aware that about 10,000 Sudras in the district of Mangalore in Malabar Coast, who had been too ill-treated by the Brahmin townsmen, held in infinite contempt and exposed to the bitterest of persecutions, applied to the Brahmo Somaj for succor, and, although a portion of them have been baptized by the Christian Missionaries, the rest are staunch in their belief of Theism, and we hope to send some of our Missionaries there to preach the glad tidings of human brotherhood and knit them together by bonds of Theistic union. God grant that we may serve the cause of truth and extend the blessings of peace and righteousness among these persecuted brothers.

You will, perhaps, be glad to know that the anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj was celebrated with great eclat. People flocked to witness its celebration from distant parts of Bengal and North Western Provinces. There were prayers, meditation, conversation, sermons, &c., throughout the entire day. A procession of Progressive friends passed through the principal streets of this city, carrying banners in their hands, and singing hymns in praise of the Most High God. There was a sermon on "The Prodigal Son" by Mr. Sen in his new chapel which was crowded to suffocation; and hundreds had to go away for want of accommodation. It was, indeed, a glorious scene to behold a Hindu discoursing on the infinite love of the Almighty Parent with a deep fervor of devotion and earnest piety, which for a time silenced the busy tongue of his adversaries even. Before his departure to Europe, Mr. Sen delivered his farewell address on "England and India" before a vast audience in the Town Hall of this city, wherein he explained the objects of his intended visit; and men of all shades of opinion, forgetting their antipathy to the Brahmo Somaj, cheered him with enthusiasm.

It would give us very great pleasure to hear from you often. We need your words of sympathy and love in the great movement which we have inaugurated. Though separated by thousands of miles of land and water, we are nearer to you in heart than to the great mass of Anglo-Saxons at our very doors. We hope that you will keep us informed of your proceedings. There are many of our brethren who would like to see your printed reports and sermons, which they have seldom an opportunity to read. I should like to have at least a dozen sets of them for distribution.

I beg to forward herewith some printed lectures which may interest you.

Trusting that through God's blessings the cause of Theism will triumph throughout the world, I remain most heartily yours in Theistic fellowship,

GOSTO BEHARY MULLIC,
Sec'y Prattohick Brahmo Somaj, Jorasanko.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAYER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

A case came before the Marine Court of New York in which the plaintiff was called upon to testify, to whom it was objected that he was an infidel, and did not believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, or in the immortality of the soul. Judge Curtis, however, said that, although such sentiments as are alleged to exist in the mind of the plaintiff justly excite the horror and condemnation of the civilized world, yet under the revised statutes and previous adjudications on the subject, the witness may be sworn, and if it is proved to the satisfaction of the jury that he entertains the pernicious views imputed to him, it then becomes a question for the jury to say to what extent they would believe the testimony of a man who has no fear of the avenging wrath of God.

Gen. Sheridan, when in Philadelphia, went to see the painting of his famous ride. On leaving, the attendant called his attention to a chromo of the picture, and solicited a purchase. "A capital likeness, sir, of General Sheridan." The General put his hands in his pockets, and mildly replied that he did not care particularly for a likeness of Sheridan. "But the horse, sir," said the young man,—"that famous black horse. There is no other picture of him in existence." "Oh!" said General Sheridan, "I own the horse." The clerk gave a low whistle.—Boston Commonwealth.

FREE RELIGION!

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Any person sending us five subscribers will be entitled to a sixth copy free.

A cash commission of Twenty per Cent. will be allowed Agents who forward to us money for five or more subscribers.

THE INDEX will be sent for three months to new subscribers on trial for Sixty Cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of Five Cents.

THE PEDIGREE OF MAN.

[Read in the Unitarian Church, Dover, N. H., Sept. 13, 1868.]

"An old lady told De Tocqueville, 'I have been reading with great satisfaction the genealogies which prove that Jesus Christ descended from David. They show that our Lord was a gentleman.'"

CONFESSIONS OF A DEMOCRAT.

The pride of birth, the boast of descent from illustrious ancestry, the flaunting of inherited plumes once worn by nobler birds, betrays always a third or fourth-rate nature. Too intense a consciousness of patrician parentage is the sure mark of a plebeian soul. He who is great in his own right will not strut about in the cast-off finery of his forefathers, even if they chanced to wear gilded spurs,—nor yet hang his head in shame, if they honestly went barefoot. The only ground of deserved respect is excellence native to the soul. When, as in Europe, pedigrees and genealogies are made the basis of distinctions in political rank or social privilege, they merit the hatred of mankind as the fountain-head of all baleful inequalities. But when, as in some parts of America, shoddy and petroleum and codfish aristocrats put their servants into livery, and purchase a family-tree raised over-night in the green-house of the Heraldry Office and fruited with stolen coats-of-arms, sensible people can afford to smile. Worth, intellect, character, are possessions attached to no title, and transmissible by no man's last will and testament; they must be born afresh in every generation. Nothing is more contemptible in a genuine republic than claims to respect not based on personal merit. The inherited glory of great ancestors is a disgrace to him who cannot equal it, and adds no honor to him who can. The proudest pedigree is rooted in the soil of a common humanity.

"When Adam dived and Eve span,
Who then was gentleman?"

If we go back far enough, we must all find our forefathers in homespun and cow-hide boots. "Every tub," as the old proverb says, "must stand on its own bottom;" and we neither gain nor lose by comparing ancestral tubs. Here we are,—and what are we worth? That question is not to be settled by a collation of genealogies.

"The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that."

The worldly pride which builds upon the merits of ancestors, and the spiritual pride which builds on the merits of Saviors and Redeemers, are equally the confession of spiritual poverty. Let us have merits of our own, and dispense with "imputed righteousness" of all sorts.

The same weakness which makes individuals ashamed of an humble parentage, makes the human race ashamed of an humble origin. As the city upstart in the flush of success tries oftentimes to conceal the fact of his rustic birth, and turns the cold shoulder to his poor relations, so civilized man tries to ignore his kinship with the animal kingdom, and refuses to recognize his country cousins, the monkey, the gorilla, and the baboon. In both cases it is the same wretched pride of the parvenu. Science is today slowly but impregnably fortifying the great truth, that the human race has been gradually developed out of inferior types of being, and that the countless species of organisms on the earth, infinitely diverse as they now appear, are related to each other somewhat as the branches and twigs of a single tree. In other words, the pedigree of man does not stand alone, but is a part, and a very small part at that, of the one great pedigree of universal organic life; man and the brutes are descended from common ancestors, partake in only varying degrees of a common nature, and have in consequence a common destiny. The history of life on the globe, from its earliest commencement to the present day, is perfectly continuous, unbroken by miracle, but is itself more wonderful than any miracle from beginning to end. This is, in substance, the famous Development Theory, which is so profoundly changing men's thoughts about God and the character of his activity in the world, and which must at last revolutionize the world's religion.

The Biblical story of man's origin is historically worthless, and persons at all acquainted with recent scientific discoveries are compelled to attribute to the human race a degree of antiquity immensely greater than that deduced from the Hebrew Scriptures. You all remember, I dare say, the date assigned to the "Creation" in the common-school text-books,—“B. C. 4004.” But no person who knows even the elements of geology can doubt that in the various strata of the earth's crust we may read the record of millions and millions of years; and it is equally impossible to doubt that Genesis and geology stand in utter contradiction. It takes an Orthodox minister to reconcile them today; and even his reconciliation satisfies no one but himself. This morning, however, I propose to show that science bases its belief in the immense antiquity of the human race, not on guesses, but on facts; and that the Biblical pedigree of man has about as much historical value as the Indian legends preserved in Longfellow's poem of Hiawatha.

Not only in the Hebrew mythology, but also in the mythologies of most other ancient nations, we find traditions of a primeval Paradise and a fall from innocence of the first created couple. For instance, the Bundeshesh (a part of the Avesta or Persian Bible) relates that Meshia and Meshiane, the first man and woman, were created by Ormuzd out of the Ribas tree, and endowed with all noble qualities in order to make themselves sovereigns of this earth by being perfectly pure in thought, word, and action. At first they obeyed, and were happy; but at last Ahriman, the Persian Satan, persuaded them to declare that all they saw was his, and thus involved them in spiritual ruin. Among the Hindus, the primeval Paradise, according to the sacred poem of the Mahabharata, was Mt. Meru, the centre of the earth, piercing the clouds with its lofty peaks, beautiful with groves and streams and melodious birds, and inhabited by the gods and blessed spirits. Here were placed the first man and woman, Swayambhuva and Satarupa, whom Siva, one Person of the Hindu Trinity, himself tempted to their fall by dropping from heaven a blossom of the vata or Indian fig. Stories more or less like these are found elsewhere, in places which there is no reason to believe that Hebrew traditions had ever reached, as for instance in the Fiji Islands. They grew, doubtless, out of the barbarian's ignorance of his own origin, his desire to have a noble pedigree, and his natural tendency to idealize the past,—a tendency by no means confined to himself, but equally exhibited by all who despise the present and fondly believe in "the good old times." The story in Genesis must be referred to a similar cause, and stands on no higher ground as to historic credibility. The creation of man only 6000 years ago can no longer be admitted in face of facts, a very few of which I will now proceed to state.

Until about thirty years ago, although fossils of countless species of fishes, reptiles, birds, and mammals had been found in great abundance, no human fossils had been discovered to which a high antiquity could with any certainty be assigned. In 1833, Dr. Schmerling, of Belgium, published a work giving the results of several years' explorations in the valleys of the river Meuse, where forty caverns, whose stalagmite floors had never before been disturbed, were found to contain, among the bones of many extinct animals, the scattered bones of men. It was clear that all these bones had been swept together into the caverns by water, and deposited there before the formation of the limestone floors. But for various reasons no conclusions could be drawn from these facts, and the questions they raised could not yet be answered.

In 1841, however, an antiquary named Boucher des Perthes took a walk from his chateau in the city of Abbeville, in France, and came to some quarries outside the city walls in which workmen were making excavations. As they were shovelling out the flints and gravel, his quick eye caught sight of a flint, unlike the rest, which he at once picked up and examined. The longer he examined it, the stronger became his conviction that this stone had been manufactured by human hands. He inquired where the stone had been dug out, and found the exact spot to be a bed of broken and water-worn flints under a deposit of loam some thirty feet thick. None of the other flints was like this. The rest were all rounded off, or covered with knobs like a potato, and crusted outside with a dull white envelope, except where a fracture exposed a rough surface to view. This flint, however, was regular in shape, chipped to an edge on both sides, and sharpened at one end in a manner indicative of numerous blows. The friction of water or other stones could not possibly have shaped it thus. The other end of the flint, like the rest of the stones where it was found, was covered with the dull white crust. There could be no mistake about it—here was a clear proof of human agency at a time previous to the deposit of those thirty feet of loam.

But Boucher des Perthes knew that, to be believed, he must accumulate further evidences. So for six years more he haunted the quarries of Abbeville, stood beside the workmen as they dug deeper into the flint-bed, and picked up the manufactured stones as they appeared. If he could not be there, he sent his servants. Whenever they came across a flint instrument, they left it where it was, and sent for the old man to come and pick it up for himself. In fact, they thought him to be a little cracked; but he cared nothing for that, and kept on collecting till he had amassed an immense number of these bits of stone, precious as nuggets of gold in the eyes of science. At last he carried a thousand of them to Paris, and showed them to the French Academy. Strange to say, they also thought him crazy! The same stupid conservatism which opposes every social reform, equally opposes every great invention and discovery; and even after Boucher des Perthes had, in 1847, published his first volume, scientific men quibbled, and ignored or denied the facts. But the old man quietly continued his researches, invincible in the love of truth; and at last the truth has made him the greatest geological archaeologist of the times.

The same discoveries were at last made elsewhere. In 1858, the Brixham cave was discovered in England. Here were long galleries several feet wide, and filled, sometimes to the very roof, with gravel, bones and mud. The mud always lay beneath a flooring of stalagmite from one to fifteen inches thick, and beneath the mud itself was a layer of loam or bone-earth from one to fifteen feet in depth. The limestone flooring itself contained bones of animals long extinct in England, as for instance the perfect antler of a reindeer. But under the flooring, and at the bottom of the layer of loam beneath it, were found many flint-knives, one of the most perfect at a depth of thirteen feet, side by side with the bones of fossil animals. Furthermore, the fact that the cave was thus filled up with aqueous deposits, proved that the surrounding country must have undergone enormous changes. Since the filling of the cave, the valleys had been lowered sixty feet; and this fact alone proved the geological age of the deposit to be immense.

By this time, Boucher des Perthes had been amply vindicated. All over Great Britain, similar deposits were found. Evidences multiplied in all quarters, that man existed at a most remote period. Not only were flints, incontrovertibly manufactured by human hands, thus found in the post-tertiary formations, but other human relics have also been found in the tertiary strata of a vastly greater age,—as reported to the French Academy not very long ago. There can be hardly a doubt, in the mind of any man competent to form an opinion on the subject, that the human race existed long anterior to its supposed creation 6000 years ago.

But I know you wish to ask, how long anterior to it?

To this question it is at present impossible to give a precise answer. Only an approximate solution of the great problem can be now reached. But something like a guess at the vast periods implied by these discoveries may be suggested by the following curious facts:—

Dr. Ildefonso, of Rio Janeiro, for several years investigated the limestone caves in the neighborhood of that city, and obtained many fossils from beneath their stalagmite flooring, which resembles that of the European caves just described. But the difference of climate between Europe and South America causes one very important difference in the character of the limestone deposit. The stalagmite flooring is produced by the percolation of lime-water through the roof of the caves, and its dropping and subsequent evaporation upon their floors. In Europe the moist climate causes an irregular dropping of water all the year round; but in the tropics, the climate is half the year dry and half the year rainy. Hence the stalagmite floors of these Brazilian caves exhibit a series of very thin plates, corresponding to the annual rings of growth in trees, and of course indicating the number of years during which the floors have been forming. Now Dr. Ildefonso states that he has again and again counted these annual plates, and found them numbering as high as twenty thousand. Consequently, it has taken twenty thousand years to form the mere flooring of the caves, to say nothing of the time required to form the underlying deposit of clay and mud.

Furthermore, the age of some human bones, found in a coral reef in Florida, has been estimated by Prof. Agassiz to be 10,000 years; that of a human skeleton found beneath the fourth cypress forest at New Orleans has been estimated by Dr. Dowler at 50,000 years; and so on. Yet the antiquity of these remains is very slight compared with that of the remains discovered in the diluvium of Abbeville,—which, again, are but modern as compared with the fossils of the tertiary strata. Prof. Lesley, from whom I have derived these scientific facts, declares his own conviction to be that the human race has inhabited this globe "for hundreds of thousands of years."

Compared with these vast periods, what a drop in the bucket are the paltry 6,000 years of the Hebrew cosmogony! Why, the beginning of Egyptian history is put by scholars of the very highest reputation at a date between B. C. 10,000 and 11,000,—and some put it earlier yet; but what a vast procession of years must have measured the savagery and barbarism antecedent to historical civilization! Proofs are heaped up in favor of the enormous antiquity of man, which only ignorance, or the most stubborn and wilful prejudice, can possibly withstand. Day by day the conviction is spreading over the Christian world that the story of Adam and Eve is an historically valueless legend; nay, the fact of the actual descent of all men from a single couple is more than questioned by men of the profoundest scientific attainments. The unity of mankind must be vindicated, not on the low plane of a common physical ancestry, but on the infinitely higher plane of a common spiritual nature. Far back in the dim mists of the past, hidden from all human eyes, is the mysterious beginning of the pedigree of man; we cannot, with all our straining, discern even whether he has a common pedigree or not, as he has reckoned pedigrees; we cannot, with all our knowledge, assert that the differences of human races may not run back to a period when the name human would have been of doubtful application.

Yet, ceasing to peer with anxious eyes into the gray shadows of antiquity, and looking rather to the proofs which man, as we know him, everywhere gives of having a spiritual nature, I believe it is no presumption to trace our pedigree up to the Infinite Spirit himself. The Father of All Life is in a true sense the common Ancestor of mankind; and it is by living as friends and brothers, that men must prove their own divine lineage as children of God. Nay,—more. The great tree of humanity strikes its roots deep into the very humblest strata of organic life, at the same time that its lofty branches penetrate the skies of the purest spiritual consciousness. All life is one. It is not enough to include even the whole human race within the broad sweep of our sympathies; it is not enough to feel the glow of enthusiasm even for the Brotherhood of Man. Our life is but part of the universal life; and we need to enter into such intimate union with Nature herself, as to become conscious of our kinship with bird and beast and flower and star. One Immanent Life pervades the universe,—infinite, eternal, transcending our thoughts as the constellations of the heavens transcend our poor astronomies. And if we are ever so foolish as to feel ashamed of the humble origin of Man,—mortified to think ourselves so closely akin to the animal creation,—let us remember that the Infinite Life of God incarnates itself as truly in the meanest worm or insect, as in the Homers and Shakespeares, in the heroes and the saints, of our own race. There is nothing high, nothing low, to the Universal Mind; and when we have once caught a glimpse of the sublime unity of Nature, and entered into sympathy with that boundless Whole of which we are but infinitesimal parts, pride is lost in humility, fear in calmness and trust, selfish desire in reverence, adoration, and love of the ONE that is the ALL.

RESPONSES.

[The communication suggesting a plan for union among the friends of Woman Suffrage, which we sent to the Revolution, the Woman's Journal, the Woman's Advocate, and the Independent, and which we published in THE INDEX, No. 19, has received the following replies.—Mr. Tilton writing us that the copy sent to him failed to reach its destination.—Ed.]

Most excellent suggestions, to which we of The Revolution say, Amen!—Revolution (May 5).

[An editorial in the same issue, however, entitled "Our President," and reprinted in our next column, proposes a wholly different line of action from that proposed in the communication thus favorably noted.—Ed.]

We publish the above, since it is sent by a faithful worker for Woman Suffrage. He will see, however, that his plan of consolidation will come to naught, when we inform him that the approaching New York meeting of the American Woman Suffrage Association is only a mass meeting, which cannot transact business. Even were it a business meeting, so grave a proposition as the disbanding of the Association would have to be carried before the annual meeting in the fall for action. It could not, by the terms of organization, be acted upon at a semi-annual meeting—least of all at a mass meeting. Mr. Abbot would not have made the above proposition, had he been cognizant of the construction of the American Woman Suffrage Association.—Woman's Journal (May 7.)

[Anticipation of this purely technical objection would simply have caused a slight change in our phraseology. The editorial opinion we requested is not given in the above.—Ed.]

In another column we print a "plan for securing unity of action among the friends of Woman Suffrage," submitted by Rev. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio. He asks our opinion as to its advisability.

The time for holding the New York Conventions will have almost arrived by the time our paper goes to press; and what is to be done in the conventions has been tolerably well determined—so much so that an opinion at this late date would probably have little effect. I have, however, this to say—(and I speak only for myself, and not for any other man or woman on God's green earth.)

To me it appears that there is not the shadow of an excuse for discord or inharmony. The advocates of woman's enfranchisement agree precisely on the great principle of the movement. There is no difference of opinion as to the end sought, nor do we differ, materially, as to the means that should be employed by which this end may be best secured. It seems, then very unfortunate and exceedingly ill-becoming the former greatness and goodness of the prominent workers in this most righteous reform, that any disorder or want of harmony should exist. I am free, also to say, that I believe it exists exclusively among those who are called "leaders." The great mass of the friends honestly desire union and harmonious action—at least this I believe to be the case in the great West, which, if it does not represent the brains of the Woman Suffrage army, makes up its rank and file. Ohio has so declared, and I believe it is the sentiment of the great majority of the western friends of our cause.

I know that many of the more prominent workers in the East, who represent, as is alleged, the two contending parties, think they are doing all they can—conceding all they ought—to bring about harmony and order. But it is apparent to the more observant, unprejudiced, unpassionate, unaspiring, cool, and therefore impartial minds of the people, that none of them are willing or ready to make such concessions as are necessary to bring about reconciliation. Good Brother Tilton saw this—as did many others—and stepped forward as propitiator. His chief error consisted in his mistaking intervention for intercession. In his anxiety to calm the troubled waters, he failed to observe strictly the necessity of self-abnegation—an indispensable qualification in a successful arbitrator of a peace.

It only remains for me to say that I heartily endorse Brother Abbot's peace proposition. The National Association, in Convention assembled on the 10th of the present month, can take final action in the matter, and extend the olive-branch of peace. The American, in its 11th of May Convention, can only express a readiness to accept it, at the annual meeting of the Association in November next. That some such plan as the one proposed by Mr. Abbot (which plan is of course susceptible of modification) will be submitted by the National, next week, and informally accepted by the American in Mass Convention assembled, I have every reason to believe. That this most worthy work of peace-making will be urged, and action unflinchingly insisted upon by the delegates who will be in attendance from the West—(which it is most meet in this case should furnish a mediator)—I most earnestly and conscientiously desire.—A. J. B., Woman's Advocate, May 7.]

[The conclusion we draw from our experiment is briefly this. The Revolution is in earnest only for "a union of all elements outside of Boston;" the Woman's Journal does not want union at all; the Woman's Advocate wants a union worthy of the name. If the former two represent their respective Associations, the proposal of union is a farce, and will come to nothing. But our experiment is successful,—we have found out exactly what we wanted to know. We aspired to no "mediatorship," but thought that some really impartial plan ought to be submitted to the public.—Ed.]

OUR PRESIDENT.

[From the Revolution, May 5.]

Who shall be the President of the National Woman's Suffrage Association? is the question on all lips and in all letters. Ordinarily I should say, some woman, most assuredly. It shows a want of faith in ourselves to place any man in that position. What should we think of the intelligent, cultivated black men in this country, if in their conventions they should always choose a white man to preside over them? We should say that they were either fools distrusting themselves, or knaves catering to the public prejudice in regard to their incapacity.

But unfortunately the women who have been leaders in this movement for a quarter of a century, being human, are now so divided with personal jealousies and animosities that they cannot unite on any one of their own number, and women just coming into the movement shrink from the antagonisms such divisions involve, and refuse all official positions. Hence, in the present emergency, as a war measure, it seems both necessary and expedient to marshal our forces under the inevitable "white male;" whether we shall ever in the good time coming escape that dynasty, is yet to be seen.

The committee that met at Fifth Avenue Hotel, April 6, nominated Theodore Tilton, one of the most deservedly popular young men in the nation, for the President of the new organization, and the friends in favor of union throughout the country will no doubt confirm that choice in the coming convention.

As the cause of Woman's Suffrage becomes popular and large numbers come to its support, division is inevitable. There will necessarily be a difference of opinion as to "men and measures" in this as there has been in all other great reforms. Wide differences of opinion and modes of action have always existed in the temperance organizations. The anti-slavery society during the thirty years of its life has split right in two twice. The state is divided into parties, the church into sects, and to require that the 15,000,000 women in this country should move in solid phalanx in one bee-line is to suppose the millennium of harmony right at hand.

Accepting disunion, then, as part of the eternal plan for quickening action, and "white male" presidents as the most available for the present emergencies, let us have done with all back-biting, envy, hatred and malice, and look at the pleasant features of the situation.

We shall have the Suffrage hosts divided into two grand armies. One marshalled by Theodore Tilton, the gifted editor of the Independent and the Brooklyn Daily Union. The other by Henry Ward Beecher, editor of the Christian Union; thus securing the advocacy of our cause in three popular journals, and placing those distinguished gentlemen under special obligations to be zealous workers for Woman's Suffrage as some compensation for the high honors we shall confer on them.

The division with Boston for its inspiration and Mr. Beecher for its head, will take a rather circuitous route to glory, if, by the way of Plymouth church, The Christian Union, Horticultural Hall, The Radical, and the Radical Club are to be brought into friendly theological relations. A broadside from Mr. Garrison, such as he gave orthodoxy at Hartford, would frighten half Mr. Beecher's followers from their propriety. However, they will probably reach the political citadel of equal suffrage some time when the union forces shall have the roads made, bridges built, and all things ready for a jubilee. The right wing will have the superior advantage in its leader of youth, fire, rare organizing talent, a daily paper unembarrassed by any connection with the unfortunate McFarland-Richardson marriage, and with the sympathy of a large majority of the old workers, and the co-operation of the mass of the earnest people in New York and through the west. In this association, too, all intelligent foreigners will find a place and fellowship, as they could not in any association called "American."

We would suggest that in the union of all elements outside of Boston, the name of the National Woman's Suffrage Association should be retained, as American is both too narrow and too comprehensive; for while it excludes foreigners, it covers the continent, the greater part of which lies outside our nation, where our laws have no jurisdiction. To change the constitutions of the federal and state governments so as to give the women within our borders the right to vote will be work enough for the present generation.

EDUCATION IN EUROPE.

[From a speech by Wm. F. Prosser, of Tenn., in the House of Representatives, Jan. 25, 1870.]

PRUSSIA.

When Prussia commenced her present system of common schools, her territory was but a fraction of its present size—was the battlefield of Europe, and echoed with the tramp of invading armies. Notwithstanding her impoverished condition she undertook the work of educating her people, and in 1848 she had two and a half million children in attendance upon her schools. Twenty years later, while environed by threatening empires, she arose in the power of superior education, reconstructed the map of Europe, and placed herself in the front rank of the nations of that part of the world, who were astonished at the brilliancy of her statesmen and the skill of her armies.

AN AUSTRIAN REPORT

published last year thus expresses the sentiment of that nation on the question we are considering:

"Never did the cry for a better system of national education in general and for an improved system of professional education in particular resound more loudly than after the terrible events which fell so heavily on our country. The dictum that 'not the needle-gun but higher national education conquered us,' struck home so forcibly that it was repeated on all sides, and became almost a proverb among us. Radical changes were clamored for, and in their zeal for improvement, people seemed to forget that there was any good at all in the established system."

Austria is literally whipped into education. During the present year her Parliament has completely remodelled the educational system. Herr von Beust has established for Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, and the Duchies, that which is now regarded as the model school code of Europe.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

Turkey has astonished the world by its recent order, promulgated by the Sultan, establishing a system of compulsory education throughout the Ottoman Empire, of which the following extract will show the scope and spirit:

"PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Elementary Instruction.

§6. The course of instruction in the primary schools shall cover four years, and will comprise the following subjects:

The alphabet according to the new method, the Koran, the Tedjvid and book of morals, catechism, writing, elements of arithmetic, Turkish history, elements of geography, epitome of practical education.

§9. Public instruction obligatory throughout the whole empire for girls from the age of six to ten, and for boys from six to eleven.

§10. The justices of the peace of the wards and villages shall keep a register on which are inscribed the names of all the boys and girls who have reached the required age, as well as the names of the parents and guardians. A copy will be handed to the teacher."

Sections eleven and twelve provide that in case parents fail to comply with the law, they shall be excommunicated with for the three first occasions, when, continuing to disregard the law, they are fined from five to one hundred piastres, according to their property, or the children may be taken from their guardianship and placed at school.

NO THANKS FOR IT.

[From the Watchman and Reflector.]

Who thanks the infidel clique for all their zeal in spreading their infidel notions? Does any wise father? any loving mother? any fond sister? any good citizen? any large-brained statesman? Christianity, at the worst, is a bond that binds to virtue; that shackles the conscience of young men and holds them back from ruin; that cheers with great hopes while life lasts, even if they perish with life itself. Infidelity, at the best, destroys all sense of moral responsibility, extinguishes all hope for the eternal future, and supplies no incentive to personal goodness, neighborly kindness and world-wide benevolence. Even the fast young man himself who has gone out from the sweet influences of a Christian home with a godly father's blessing on his head and a mother's undying blessing in his heart, can never think of thanking his companions for undermining his faith, blasting his hopes and driving him as from an Eden into a world accursed. Tom Paine at last wishes every one had burned his books, as did the pious woman who was his ministering angel when every infidel friend had forsaken him. The arch-deceiver found no complacency even in his own satanic success.

Such thoughts as these were suggested by some conversation between two gentlemen of the same town, lately overheard in a horse-car.

"I don't believe in being so narrow," said one, "I believe in taking a liberal view of everything."

"But I believe," responded the other, a man of noble brow, who looked like one who was wont to do his own thinking, "that there is such a thing as being a bit too liberal. I've heard of your preaching your infidel liberality to the young men of our town, a hard set, as you well enough know, that don't believe in any good thing whatever. I don't thank Tom Paine for his infidel writings, nor my friends for inducing me to read them."

"So you've read them?"

"Yes, to my sorrow. But I take no pains to let it be known, and those that know it I warn against reading them."

"Well," answered the other, "I've always got along well enough, and if I'm right in my family and honest among my fellow-men, I don't see why that isn't enough for any body. I don't believe in being so strict as these religionists are."

"For my part I like them, and from what I see and know of their character and the results of their faith, I would rather live among them than among any of your infidels, and that too, even if I should have to go with them to hell at last. You and I, sir, have got to stand in a court where we shall have to answer for ourselves, without any backers."

"Well, I'm not afraid to go there. I've no fear of death."

"But I, for my part, feel that there's a mystery around death which makes me afraid. I confess I'm a coward."

"Well, I ain't."

"You haven't come to the test," broke in a third person.

The car was full. All listened with interest, and evidently in sympathy with the honest-hearted gentleman who had not yet succeeded in fully throwing off the shackles of skepticism, and who had no thanks for those who had thrown them around him. The conversation was arrested by the car's reaching its terminus.

[The "man of noble brow", being a self-confessed "coward," should join the church. Orthodoxy would perish but for such cowardice as his. When men get the mastery of their fears, they demand a religion whose spirit is courage.—ED.]

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"—Somebody (knowing my weakness) has sent me THE INDEX. I have read it carefully and like its tone and spirit. It seems to fill a void in our journalism that has been an aching void for years to any person who is not an idol-worshipper. Mankind must be led; they are mainly driftwood, and to keep them from standing on sand-bars of belief, or going to pieces on hidden reefs of vice, they must be taken in tow by some power able and wise enough to keep the open sea of truth. May THE INDEX continue long to point toward the light, and show man that the right of individuality is more important than any special opinion."

"—Will you please send me two or three copies of THE INDEX containing the essay on the 'Management of Children,' which should be read by every young mother in the land. I am sorry to trouble you so often, and wish it were in my power to subscribe for a dozen copies extra every week for regular distribution among friends and acquaintances. This I cannot do just now, therefore send for the few I must have."

"—We all enjoy reading your addresses more than anything else, they are so candid and clear, and above the necessity of calling opponents bad names in order to show the truth of the cause espoused. Then it is so comfortable to find one's thoughts expressed so much better than one could even think them, particularly when they are not popular thoughts."

"—Enclosed find ten dollars, for which please send THE INDEX as long as the money lasts to the following persons:— If you have the numbers of April 2, commence with that number to all of them, and stop the paper when the money runs out, as it is possible they would not wish to continue it."

"—You may put me down as a life subscriber, if your paper should continue so long. I have been a constant reader of it since the first number was issued, and cannot do without it. It was a constant visitor to the reading room of the Michigan University, when I made its acquaintance."

"—Being a member of an Orthodox Congregational Church, and having received a little light through the sermons of Theodore Parker, I wish to continue the good work by reading THE INDEX."

"—I did not receive No. 8. of THE INDEX; will you please send me a copy? I am so much gratified with it that I cannot lose a number. It is a great satisfaction to me that we have one candid, outspoken and well-conducted liberal journal. I cannot say too much in its favor. When it is doubled in size, it cannot fail to be one of the very best papers published. I was sorry to read what you said about immortality in your last number. Does not the person of fine spiritual organization have an intuition of a future life which is its most positive evidence? Is any stronger needed? Horace Greeley says Margaret Fuller not only believed but knew that life was immortal. Will not the majority rest in Christianity as furnishing an authoritative revelation of a future life, or accept Spiritualism as furnishing demonstrative proof to that effect? If Free Religion can furnish nothing more positive about the future life than you say it does, I fear it will never be accepted but by a limited few. Those few will undoubtedly be the choicest spirits, but necessarily limited in number. I believe with you, however, that the present life, with its duties, is the main object of attention. If we nobly meet life now, we need not have any fear of the future. I find many everywhere who accept Free Religion. The times are ripe for such a religion. The best-read and most thinking men, I find, accept its teachings. Professional men, teachers, farmers, mechanics, all who think for themselves are in sympathy with this movement. Why can't you send out an agent who will canvass for THE INDEX and preach Free Religion at the same time? Almost every town would give him a hearing. I believe you might increase your subscription list in this way so that THE INDEX would be an assured success. If I had the ability, I should like nothing better than to undertake this work. I suppose the great difficulty would be to find some one to go into it. We need to have Free Religion preached here in the West. A great harvest may be reaped when it is. May the time soon come!"

"—THE INDEX is a perfect reflection of principles I have held for years on religious subjects. Absolute freedom of the human soul from all authority but Truth, of which each individual is the only proper judge, is the only rule for all men. Indeed authority as taught by religionists is wholly worthless from their own stand-point, because the human soul can appropriate no more of truth when backed by authority than when it is not; and only what can be appropriated is of use. A stone is no more bread when backed by authority than when not, and bread cannot be made stone or more nourishing by authority. All great souls have recognized this principle. Jesus taught it emphatically in what is called the Golden Rule, in which he refers every soul to itself for guidance. It is most strange that the teachers of the Christian religion have so generally failed to understand that the chief corner-stone of their religion practically crushed out all authority except the still small voice in each individual soul. Jesus said 'do as ye would,' not as I would or as Moses would or as Paul would, but as 'ye would be done by.' This is free religion. This is rationalism. This is the absolute freedom of the human soul."

"—Please find enclosed two dollars for your excellent paper. I hope to see number three reprinted, and see your journal spread all the country over, as it really deserves."

IV. THE PALACE OF THE SUN.

Majestic turrets towering to the sky,
 Proud columns crowned with stainless ivory,
 Refulgent gold, the pyrope's fiery ray,
 Proclaimed the palace of the God of Day.
 The burnished portals of the mansion vast,
 In stately folds, a silvery radiance cast,
 Bright shone the jewelled treasures of the mine,
 Yet still surpassed by Vulcan's skill divine,
 Whose cunning hand had carved in every part
 The varied wonders of his matchless art.
 The fertile land, the dim-receding shore,
 The vast expanse of ocean spread before,
 The arching vault of heaven's ethereal blue,
 Were clearly imaged to the astonished view.
 The swelling sea its deities displayed,
 Whose will supreme the restless waves obeyed,—
 Doris and Nereids, Triton with his shell,
 The changeful Proteus and Ægeon fell,
 Whose hundred arms the huge-stretched grampus pressed,
 Unwieldy floating on the billow's crest.

THE RELIGIOUSNESS OF FREE THOUGHT.

We take pleasure in publishing a communication from Rev. R. H. Howard, an article by whom we recently reprinted from the Christian Advocate. Except in the personal allusions towards the end, which are harsh, its tone is broad and catholic. We regret the exception all the more because of the contrast. As our readers well know, we must think some of the gentlemen named to be logically inconsistent in their retention of the Christian name; but we think it presumptuous to pronounce upon their motives as Mr. Howard has done. Only three years ago, we were exposed to the same uncharitable judgment, which nevertheless we did not deserve. If logical inconsistency always had its root in moral cowardice, we should be forced to pass criticisms equally severe on Mr. Howard himself; as will appear below. But we refrain, not from motives of forbearance, but because severe criticism would be unjust. We wish he had refrained for the same reason.

Mr. Howard makes a mistake, when he supposes that free thinkers "know nothing about" the "deep religious wants and spiritual aspirations" of which he speaks. He seems to think, with Henry Ward Beecher, that "Free Religion requires men to live in a vacuum,"—that it gives no play to the religious instincts and sympathies which in the Christian Church lie at the bottom of all profound and genuine "piety." He forgets that some of us have passed through his own "experience," of which he thinks we know nothing because he himself knows nothing of the causes which make it in the end as unsatisfactory as saw-dust to all who are by nature compelled to live a life of thought as well as of emotion. It is not enough to make men "holy,"—they must also be strong, brave, independent, eagle-eyed and eagle-winged, incapable of that child-like submission to intellectual tutelage which Christianity demands. The free thinker is of the same flesh and blood as the Christian,—visited by the same divine visions, stirred by the same aspirations, ennobled by the same high purposes. But he hearkens more fearlessly to the voice of truth,—leaps the walls of discipleship to a Master that he may plunge into the vast, beautiful world beyond, follow the guidance of Nature, and climb heights of freedom and self-reliance from which the timid believer shrinks back aghast.

It is because the deepest spiritual aspirations are baffled at every point by Christianity, that many of the truest radicals leave the Church forever. The idea of God is belittled by the Christian theology, and despoiled of its grandest moral attributes; the craving for spiritual fellowship is cramped in its expansion by narrow Church barriers; the ideal of personal character is dwarfed to the stature of an historic model; the love of truth is straight-jacketed by the superstitious dread of going beyond what is written. He that finds God to be the Open Secret of Nature, the immanent Life of all that is, revolts at the childish and contradictory statements about him sown broadcast over every page of the Scriptures; he that would embrace in the circle of his sympathies all the good and pure, is disgusted by a system which sorts men according to their creeds, and labels them good or bad according as they think thus or so; he that cherishes an ideal grander than ever yet found historic realization turns away even from the beautiful figure of Jesus, when thrust upon his sight as the absolute paragon for imitation; he that hungers for truth cannot pore forever over a book. It is the deepening and enlarging of the aspirations to which Mr. Howard refers, not the absence of them, that impels the most thoughtful and the most religious to quit the fold of the Church. They have outgrown their "need of Christ."

That Mr. Howard is not unreservedly sincere, or that he cherishes any "latent skepticism," it would be the height of arrogance even to hint; nor should we dream of hinting or thinking it. On the contrary, we rejoice that so earnest and able an advocate of Christianity is moved to urge its claims before the audience he will find in the readers of THE INDEX. He is certainly not one of those we had in mind in our editorial on "The Invisible Church." Will he pardon us, however, for saying that the generosity of tone and liberality of spirit he manifests appears explicable only by a certain want of logic in following out his own Christian premises? If "faith in Christ" be the sole condition of salvation and the supreme duty of all to whom Christ is known (which Mr. Howard, we presume, will hardly deny), we do not see how he can logically help looking upon us as a sinner doomed to destruction by the righteous wrath of God, and therefore deserving of unmixed condemnation by all Christians. That he should think us "honest," even, seems to be a dangerous reflection on the character of God, whose reputation would certainly be compromised by the perdition of honest men. Mr. Howard thinks the Watchman and Reflector logical in holding Dr. Clarke to his premises in certain points; but we think it equally logical in criticising him for calling us a "good" man. If faith in Christ has anything to do with "goodness," neither Dr. Clarke nor Mr. Howard has any logical right to regard us otherwise than as a bad man. We confess that our sense of logic is quite as much pleased by the Watchman and Reflector's sturdy fidelity to its own first principles in refusing to call us "good," as our sense of generosity is pleased by Mr. Howard's inconsistency in calling us so. Only a Protestant could be thus inconsistent, if, as we believe, Protestantism is an incongruous mixture of Catholicism and Free Religion. It is to their unconscious Free Religion that we ascribe Mr. Howard's and Mr. Beecher's largeness of spirit,—which is none the less beautiful for being illogical. We certainly respect their right to their own convictions, rejoice that they find happiness in their own faith, and do indeed bid them both "God-speed in their course." Our criticism of Mr. Beecher, which seems sharp to Mr. Howard, was simply the parrying of a counter-criticism, and was quite justified by it. If we over-estimated the temperature of his Church, and under-estimated its ventilation, he certainly failed to do justice to our "vacuum," which in the most friendly spirit we recommend on trial to both Mr. Beecher and Mr. Howard.

ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION OF THE RADICAL CLUB OF TOLEDO.

In answer to inquiries addressed to us by distant correspondents concerning the constitution and management of this Club, we publish below its articles of association, adopted May 8. Until that date, it had had no formal organization; and that now adopted is of the simplest possible character. The meetings have been well attended since last autumn, and the discussions have been exceedingly interesting. Such a Club, with trifling changes, perhaps, could be readily organized anywhere; and our chief purpose in this notice is to recommend the formation of clubs similar to this wherever a dozen earnest liberals can be got together. It is quite time that the supposed dependence upon a regular speaker should be exploded. No doubt a regular, settled speaker will be a great help; but the people ought to have intelligence enough and interest enough to support such meetings by themselves. The influence of these Clubs will be rapidly and powerfully felt, wherever formed. Let absolute freedom of speech be allowed, so long as courtesy and decorum are not violated. All extremes of opinion have been frankly expressed in the Toledo Club, and yet perfect harmony has prevailed. We propose this plan of spontaneous local organization with great confidence in its value and feasibility; and hope to hear of such Clubs springing up everywhere. Who will begin?

ART. I. This Association shall be known as "THE RADICAL CLUB OF TOLEDO."

ART. II. The object of the Radical Club shall be the free discussion of all questions, religious or otherwise, which shall be of interest to its members,—to the end that truth may be discovered, and the spirit of free inquiry increased in the community. All persons are cordially invited to become members or to participate in the discussions.

ART. III. Meetings of the Radical Club shall be held at such times and places as the members shall by vote appoint.

ART. IV. Any person may become a member of the Radical Club by subscribing these articles of association. But all persons present at any of its meetings, whether members or not, shall have an equal right to speak in the discussion, and to vote on any question except the election of officers and the amendment of these articles.

ART. V. The officers of the Radical Club shall be a Chairman, a Secretary, and a Committee of Three.

ART. VI. A new Chairman shall be elected at each meeting of the Club; and it shall be his or her duty to preside over the Club during the discussion.

ART. VII. The Secretary shall be elected to serve for six months; and it shall be his or her duty to keep a record of the place, date, and subject of each discussion, and of the names of all the speakers in their order. But in no case shall any report of the discussion, or any comments upon the same, be entered in the Secretary's books. If occasion require it in the opinion of the Club, the Secretary shall also discharge the duty of Treasurer.

ART. VIII. The Committee of Three shall be elected to serve for six months. It shall be their duty to announce at each meeting a subject of discussion for the following meeting; and to attend to any miscellaneous business on vote of the Club.

ART. IX. The regular election of the Secretary and Committee of Three shall take place at the first meetings of the Club in April and October respectively. The first election shall be held at such place and time as shall be voted by the Club. A plurality of the votes cast shall be sufficient to elect.

ART. X. These articles may be amended by a two-thirds vote of the members present at any regular meeting of the Club. But notice of the motion to amend shall be given at the previous meeting.

QUERIES.

MOLINE, ILL., March 29, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir:—I have taken THE INDEX three months, and send you the pay for three months longer. I wish to say that I have been deeply interested and somewhat instructed by its perusal, and am quite anxious to see where you will finally land your bark, as you appear to be in the open sea at present. Hope it will be in the harbor of truth, wherever it may be found. As you appear to endure questioning with good temper, please allow me to ask whether the "one, omnipresent, eternal, infinite Power or Force" is an intelligent Being, existing anterior to the creation of the universe, and possessed of moral attributes, such as justice, love, &c., and if so, is he in any way concerned to reward the good and punish the wicked in this or in another state of being?

Respectfully yours,

H. VAN ORDEN.

P. S.—I desire further to ask, whether there is really such a thing as a moral conscience in man, and if so, where is its source.

H. V.

[The delay in publishing Mr. Van Orden's communication certainly has not been caused by its undue length; but, being mislaid, it escaped notice. The questions asked, we think, have been answered in THE INDEX in the main, since the note was written. We will simply add that we believe in no absolute "creation" of the universe, regarding matter as eternal; and that we believe in no arbitrary "rewards and punishments," either here or hereafter, but believe that actions bear their natural fruit of joy or suffering according to their intrinsic character. These ideas seem to us alone consonant with enlightened views of God.—ED.]

NUTS FOR ORTHODOXY TO CRACK.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 9, 1870.

Dear Index:—

May I ask a question or two, and will you invite some orthodox (?) minister to answer me? I live in Brooklyn, and often on a Sunday evening go to hear Henry Ward Beecher. When he preaches "God is Love," he is inspired and inspiring; but when he tries to frighten sinners into being good by holding out threats of eternal punishment, he halts and stumbles; for I know it goes against his conscience to try to prove that God is less kind than an earthly father, and punishes vindictively, not remedially.

But to my question. Some weeks ago, H. W. B. said in his Sunday evening's discourse:—"God endeavors to draw us towards him." Now doesn't the word "endeavor," in that connection, imply fallibility, and is it reasonable to suppose that the Omnipotent can plan, and fail?

Last night he said, "Christ died—blessed be God!—not to save the righteous, but sinners."

QUERY. Were there any "righteous" until Christ died, according to orthodox teachings?

Then he laid great stress on—"it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure"; and I say to myself—"then if God does not 'work' in me, am I responsible for not doing his good pleasure?"

I cannot reconcile religion—as taught in his church—with reason. I ask myself (and now I ask you, as I'm tired of getting no reply) how can ministers preach that God is Omnipotent, Omnipresent and all love, if he, foreseeing a man is to be born who will choose sin and incur damnation, permits the birth? I'll never believe it of my dear heavenly father! I have an innate consciousness that I can choose between good and evil, and that I shall hereafter be rewarded or punished in proportion as I choose the one or the other, but "eternal damnation!"

My God, forgive them! and don't make a hell to punish those who do these such dishonor!

B. D. S.

[Will any "orthodox (?) minister" come to the rescue of H. W. B.? He has the floor.—ED.]

THE "GREAT ENIGMA."

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 6, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir:—I have read the discussion recently conducted through the columns of your admirable organ of free thought, with much interest and pleasure, and am decidedly of your opinion regarding the character of evidence required to set at rest all reasonable doubts about the "Great Enigma." All unprejudiced minds are satisfied that so-called revelation has established nothing towards a solution, and Spiritualism has also done nothing except to show that its devotees are deluded with mere subjective phenomena and very thin legerdemain on the part of the so-called mediums. That system of self-deception, disease, and jugglery has had its day. Nothing but Evangelical intolerance ever gave it any influence.

Has the doctrine of a Future Life been beneficial in its effects upon mankind, or is not that belief, like other uncivilized conceptions, responsible for much of the evil with which our race is afflicted?

I should be greatly pleased to have an expression of your views upon this phase of the subject through THE INDEX.

Very respectfully,

"INQUIRER."

[Although entirely unconvinced of the "fact of spirit-intercourse," we are inclined to the opinion that the so-called phenomena of "Spiritualism" manifest strange forces of mind or matter which deserve to be scientifically studied. At least, the testimony of persons in whose veracity we have absolute confidence seems to establish facts for which we have no explanation to offer. Whether these facts are explicable by any known laws or not, the influence of Spiritualism has been on the side of liberal thought; and so far it has certainly done a good work. Remembering how new truths are always greeted with opposition and scorn, we have scrupulously forbore either to satirize or deny what we do not understand. We have known too many Spiritualists of keen intelligence and unexceptionable character not to treat Spiritualism with respect. But we are not convinced of its great doctrine,—nor likely to be convinced, unless we meet experiences altogether new.

As to the influence of the doctrine of a Future Life, we think that on the whole this doctrine has done more good than evil. So far as it has operated to withdraw interest and effort from the present life, its influence has been bad; but this bad influence has arisen from the false theology with which the doctrine in question has been associated. We see no more harm likely to follow from the simple thought that life shall continue after death, than from the thought that life shall continue after to-morrow. All depends on what conceptions are attached to the simple thought of immortality. But when we remember what unspeakable consolation flows from it in bereavement,—when we remember what countless thousands of aching hearts have found their only solace in their hope of meeting again those who were dearer than life itself,—it seems to be the greatest anodyne for human sorrow, next to the faith that, happen what may, all is well.—ED.]

AN INSIDE VIEW OF CHRISTIANITY.

BROOKFIELD, MASS., May 8, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir:—Allow me to thank you for the numbers of THE INDEX received, also for giving my article a place in your columns, and for the editorial comment devoted to it. Permit me to say I receive your admonition in the spirit in which it was given. Doubtless some day you will discuss the points presented in my article, taking as your topic—"The Relative Value of Head Religion, or Speculative Theology, as compared with Heart Religion,"—or a religion which, while it really does no violence to the logical reason, aims first of all to satisfy the moral reason,—the spiritual nature, the moral instincts and religious wants of the soul; a religion, accordingly, which vindicates its claim to divinity by "touching and deepening the best aspirations of human nature." I think it is a fact which should ever be borne in mind by the class known as free-thinkers, that, if the Gospel seems divine to us beyond all peradventure, it is because it responds to deep religious wants and spiritual aspirations of which they have never been conscious and hence know nothing about. Christ has always been a "root out of dry ground" to unbelievers, and there is no comeliness in him that they should desire him; but why? Why was the Gospel a stumbling-block to the Jews, and foolishness to the proud, intellectual Greeks, as also to the Apostles of Reason to-day? Simply because the latter have never felt their need of him. If, now, there be uncounted multitudes who actually find in Christ and his Gospel that which exactly satisfies their religious need,—what one of your correspondents correctly represents, indeed, as in some sense a universal need,—that voice of universal aspiration,—that universal preaching after the divine, characteristic of the race,—why lead a crusade against it? Christ-ianity ought never bitterly to condemn, much less persecute, those who cannot conscientiously advocate or embrace it. Christ did no such thing, and ought not to be held responsible, for the bigotry and intolerance have by no means been all on one side. Nine tenths of all our radicals and free thinkers, not by any means excepting Theodore Parker or Mr. Alger, have done but little else than bitterly to assail and denounce Orthodoxy. The sweet spirits among the Radicals, like Emerson and Frothingham, are few indeed.

Permit me to say further that my mind is naturally rationalistic. I have an irresistible tendency to want to see the reason of things,—if not in their own essential nature, at least in their uses and adaptations. Now, then, the Gospel satisfies me in that; I see it making men holy and happy, promoting an intelligent piety, liberal religious views, and the spirit of universal brotherhood. No one holds religious doctrines to a more rigid amenability to common sense than I. The ancient Calvinistic representations of the Divine character I should have hated and denounced as cordially as you. But when I look to Christ and find that, by being baptised into his mind and united to him by a faith that works by love, a strong personal friendship, he not only helps to make me holy, but also to make me free, you cannot wonder that I fervently testify to the excellency of the knowledge of his Gospel. I am not, therefore, as you will perceive, one of those believers in whom there lurks any "latent scepticism,"—who are vaguely conscious of the essential weakness and untenability of their position,—who have any reluctance whatever to being brought face to face honestly with the great problem of the best way to redeem men from the bondage of vice to a knowledge of the true God. I intelligently believe, and deeply feel these doctrines to be true; and the transcendent superiority of that religion that starts with love to that which starts with the reason, is seen in the fact that love not only casts out fear, but casts out doubt. The man that truly loves never doubts any more than he fears. In the case, therefore, of the Christian, acquainted with the life and power of godliness, his hope of heaven, instead of being merely the creation of a pleasant dream, the plausible presumption of a speculative hope, becomes a triumphant assurance,—a victorious hope, such as that which animated Paul and Peter. Now, then, dear friend and brother, will you permit me to say, when you discuss Evangelical Christianity—particularly when disposed to criticise and denounce it,—will you remember that this is the thing you are assailing? See that you do not put up a man of straw for the sake of demolishing it. If the type of religion herein described, and enjoyed by thousands, be offensive to you,—rationally obnoxious to stricture or criticism,—then it is certainly your privilege to state and defend your objections. It is reasonable to suppose that you have never been much, if any, brought in contact with genial, intelligent Evangelical piety. If you had, I do not think you would have ever written concerning Mr. Beecher's joyous, "lively," victorious hope, as you did in the last INDEX, as springing up in an "unventilated, super-heated, stifling atmosphere." Allow me to say that his customary utterances,—embodying what seem to me truly rational and liberal views on the subject of religion,—contrast very strikingly with the melancholy, plaintive tone which characterizes your own. But (and here is the point) inasmuch as you have never had Mr. Beecher's experience, and accordingly know nothing personally about what to him is such a satisfying portion, why should you speak so disparagingly of his faith, and seek to undermine any man's faith in his blessed hope? Allowing that your faith may be best for you, does not the very liberality which you advocate and claim demand that you cordially allow that what fits me best, is doubtless best and truest for me, and, accordingly, cordially bid me God-speed in my course? The truth is, there are countless thousands who have found Christ's yoke easy because it was a perfect fit, and his burden light because in his service affection becomes the mainspring of duty,—the yoke and the burden, meantime, becoming easier and lighter as life wears away, until at length they disappear altogether, and the soul of man, merging into that larger liberty found in obedience to the law of love, enters upon the enjoyment of the full liberty of the Sons of God. Can Free Religion do for man more than this? In the meantime, in the opinion of the Christian public, the position you occupy is at least consistent, is manly and honest, and contrasts favorably with the one occupied by such men as Chadwick of Brooklyn, and the Collyers of Chicago, who occupy substantially your position, and yet do not dare, have not the manliness and fairness, to call themselves by their true name. The Watchman and Reflector is right, when it tells James Freeman Clarke, for whose talents and eloquence I have the highest respect, that the only substantial, tenable grounds in opposition to your criticisms on the popular doctrine of the atonement of Christ, are those occupied by the Evangelical church; that the moment we leave these, there can be no pause until we reach your present position.

The ability displayed in your editorial columns is universally conceded; and as regards mechanical appearance, I know of no paper that compares with yours.

Yours truly,

R. H. HOWARD.

A DEFINITION.

What is religion?

The recognition of a principle of moral government, superior to that which evidently controls the brute creation. The consciousness of this relation and obligation is variously expressed in the different forms or Systems of Religion which have existed in all ages and among all nations.

Just so soon as this principle is recognized, the creature ceases to be a mere brute and becomes allied to the human. This is the line of demarcation between these two divisions of the animal kingdom.

THE BIBLE ON WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

BY MRS. _____

[Concluded.]

In the New Testament women are spoken of with much greater respect than in the Old. They are praised in their "proper sphere," in works of charity and mercy. No one can deny that the Bible furnishes many noble examples of the lofty character of women. But that is nothing to the question; for even the most rigorous despotism, whether regal or social, has never been able to crush out the divine seed of truth and virtue in the human soul. There is, however, no indication that even the leaders of Christianity allowed woman a place by the side of man; and lest some of them should crave a larger liberty, as I imagine they did, they are distinctly commanded to keep their places.

"Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything let them ask their husbands at home, for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." I Cor. 14: 34, 35.

"Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord; for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church, and he is the Savior of the body. Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything." Eph. 5: 22, 24.

"Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in transgression." I Tim. 2: 11, 14.

"Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that if any obey not the word, they also may, without the word, be won by the conversation of the wives: while they behold your chaste conversation, coupled with fear. For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands. Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord, whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement." I Peter 3: 1, 2, 5, 6.

These passages need no explanation; they are pointed, significant, decisive. Pages of comment cannot change the meaning of words. I confess I see no way of evading their teachings.

The rapid growth and immense power of the Methodist Church has been attributed to the influence of its women, who have been permitted to speak and take part in the other exercises of worship. This is no doubt true, at least in a measure; but that it is in direct opposition to the instruction of the apostles, the above quotations will show.

One more citation, and I have done. "The one lesson taught all through the Bible is individual rights and a domestic form of government." As I read it, I do not understand it so. From first to last, the power of one man over all others, and of all men over women, is admitted. The right of fathers over daughters, husbands over wives, and conquerors over captives, is absolute and unquestioned, even if that right be exercised to their degradation and disgrace. Even Jesus commands submission to tyrants rather than resistance, and holds out to his disciples the hope of a future glorious kingdom in which they are to rule over the twelve tribes of Israel, and wherein even he does not scruple to assign high places to noted polygamists. It is difficult to explain these passages as always figurative. And among all his sayings of which we have an account, there is not one explicit declaration of the equality, in rights, of all human creatures. From this there are but two modes of escape: either this inequality as to rights was not regarded as wrong, or the record of his teachings which has come down to us is deficient, and does not mention his opinions on this subject.

Henry C. Wright says, with much truth: "One of the worst results of the common view of the infallibility of the Bible is, that those who are trained to it are obliged to exercise their ingenuity, constantly, to reconcile the most revolting acts of revenge and pollution with justice and purity. Had they seen these deeds recorded in any other book, they would have pronounced them wicked in the highest degree; but finding them in the Bible, which they are taught to regard as the word of God, they are driven to the necessity of trying to reconcile with truth, justice, love, and all that is right and good, what they themselves would declare to be falsehood, injustice and revenge, had they been recorded anywhere else."

We must, then, if we regard the teaching of the Bible as final, give up all thought of progress in this direction, and insist that women have all the "rights" they ought to have; in fact, a great many more than the women of the Bible—or else we must deny its authority on this subject. When we consider the immense progress of the last eighteen centuries,—that the people at that time, groaning under the burdens of a tyrannical and hereditary government, were unacquainted with the developments of science, and the numerous inventions with which civilization has added so much to the happiness of mankind,—and especially when we look at the advance in mental and moral culture, the broader outlook of men upon the universe,—can we fail to see that a rule of conduct for the Jews may not be the best for us? It is civilization and science and general knowledge that are to uplift the human race, not blind obedience. Ignorance is the root of sin, and only as it is dispelled will the sorrow and crime attendant upon it be lessened.

In thus viewing the teachings of the Scriptures, let it not be thought that I wish to cast obloquy upon the Bible. But while we acknowledge and revere the truths contained in it, it is not necessary that we accept the whole of it as above error, nor admit its sayings as having universal application. It was written as a religious book, not intended for a scientific treatise, or a dissertation on civil and political rights and government. Why should we distort its clear teachings in order to fit them to our preconceived ideas? The foundation of equal rights for all is laid, not in the Bible, but deep in the reason and conscience of mankind. By appeals to these, then, let the great issue be settled.

THE INDIANA STATE PRISON SOUTH.

[Cor. Indianapolis Journal.]

I have visited the State Prison at Jeffersonville, and enjoyed the hospitality of Col. Shuler, the Warden, as well as a most excellent opportunity to examine into the workings of his humanitarian ideas. The result is, that, if in doubt before, I am now fully convinced that criminals, even of the worst type, still have the characteristics of humanity, latent, if not active, and are therefore subject to the influence of love, and quick to respond to kind treatment.

It is but telling the simple truth to say that Colonel S. has won the confidence and most profound respect of every prisoner under his care, and the result is they are almost without exception faithful, obedient and earnestly desirous of becoming better men and women. Your readers remember the recent fire which destroyed one wing of the prison. During the time the flames were raging, every cell door was thrown open, and every prisoner worked manfully to subdue the fire. Many of them who had not been outside the walls for years were trusted to go at will, yet but one attempt at escape occurred, and he was recaptured. It was a common remark among the prisoners on that occasion, that it was a great temptation, but "I can't treat Colonel Shuler so badly as to leave him in this way."

Colonel Shuler is doing a noble work, and, for the sake of humanity and the interests of the State, it is to be hoped he may be retained in this position as long as he will accept it.

Mrs. Dixon, the new Matron, is in full sympathy with the Colonel's ideas, and is succeeding admirably in the management of the female convicts.

The Catholic Telegraph, Arch-Bishop Purcell's organ, in its issue of Nov. 5, 1869, says:—

From the atheistic theory that the State has authority to tax for education, separated from all religious influence, the journalistic supporters of the school-law had to yield to the advocacy of religious instruction. It was this transition that brought them into direct antagonism with the law to sustain the system that tramples upon the rights of Catholics. That blindness has driven these defenders of common schools to a second defeat. The first chapter in the school controversy is closed, and ends with the triumph of the law.

The second chapter will open with agitation against the law itself, in the name of justice and the right that both Protestants and Catholics have to positive religious instruction in separate schools. If the school-law be modified so as to secure a denominational education for all, Catholics will cheerfully pay their portion of the school-fund. If this wise amendment cannot be made, taxation for school-purposes must cease. Now that the Bible has been excluded from the schools, if professed Protestants have been sincere in all that they have said in its favor, they must agree with the Catholics in the second issue of this question. Consistency will make them our friends in the future.*

Wendell Phillips tells a story of a Boston editor, to whom he carried an article for publication, and who objected to the last sentence. "Can't you leave that out, Mr. Phillips?" "No, I can't. That's the kernel of the whole thing,—I wrote it for that last sentence." "Well," said the editor, "it's all true, and everybody knows it's true—but it won't do for me to say it. However, I'll print your article." Sure enough he did, and signed my name to it, said Mr. Phillips, but he added in another column his regret "that Mr. Phillips saw fit to make the unfounded and injurious assertion contained in his last sentence." That editor dreaded public opinion, which in this country is not only omnipotent but omnipresent.

DRIVER—"They tell me there've been some coins found in these 'ere exkavations that 'a been buried there a matter 'o four or five 'undred year!"

PASSENGER FRIEND—"O, that's nothin'! Why there's some in the British Museum—ah—more than two thousand year old!"

DRIVER (after a pause)—"Come, George, that won't do, yer know! 'Cause we're only in eight'n 'undred and sixty-nine now."

A London journal speaks of the female advocates of woman's rights in this country as "the shrieking sisterhood."

SPEAKERS FOR THE MEETING.

Before the next number of THE INDEX appears our Annual Convention will be in session. There is every prospect of a full and interesting meeting. In addition to the speakers named in the above notice, there have been invited David A. Wasson, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Theodore Tilton, Mrs. C. H. Dall, from whom, at this writing, positive answers have not been received, but some, if not all, of whom we have good reason to believe will speak at some one or other of the sessions. John Weiss and F. E. Abbot will speak in the morning session. The special point of the former is to be the Tendencies and Possibilities of Religion in America, and how the Free Religious Association can aid in developing the same. The Boston daily papers for the week will give a more complete list of the speakers than we are able to give here.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

Again we remind the members and friends of the Association of the importance of attending the Business meeting on Thursday at 3 P. M. in Parker Fraternity Hall. The details of business will occupy but little time, and there is no reason why the session should not be made an occasion for a free and earnest consultation on the practical objects and work of the Association. Let us then come together, friends, and discuss the whole subject of Ways and Means.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

This distinguished Hindu Reformer is having a most cordial reception in England. The English correspondent of the Christian Register gives a very interesting account of a public welcome which has been extended to him in London, and in which various Christian sects, and also Jews, joined to do him honor. The Hindu in his response appears to have shown himself not a whit inferior to any of the distinguished men who spoke on the occasion, although Dean Stanley and James Martineau were among them. According to this report, most nobly did he resist the temptation courteously to gloss over the difference between his own religious views and Christianity. He spoke very plainly of the errors of Christian missionaries in India, and told his hearers boldly that he had not come to London to learn their theologies (he knows enough of them already), but that he wanted to see the practical part of their religion, and asked them to show him their best. We extract the following from the Register's letter:—

"The chair was well and most appropriately filled by Samuel Sharpe, Esq., the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—a gentleman well known for his earnest devotion to Unitarianism and for his ability as a scholar, to which his translation of the Bible bears witness. The Secretary, Rev. Robert Spears, read several letters from prominent men, all expressing regret at being unable to attend. The resolution, expressing the welcome to the distinguished guest, was moved by Dr. Stanley, the noble and accomplished Dean of Westminster. His speech, so simple, broad, manly, was entirely in keeping with his high character, and worthy of his great reputation. He pointed the stranger to that meeting as an evidence that, notwithstanding all their differences, there is still a common Christianity to which they could look with reverence. He also called for the recognition of everything true and good in the religion of India, on the part of Englishmen. He said also that the religion of India, when regenerated, is not to be the English form of Christianity imported into that country, but a form that shall arise and grow in the native soil. Lord Lawrence, the late Governor General of India, in a brief, manly speech, gave an interesting personal account of the reformer, speaking of him as an intimate and highly-valued friend.

He bore witness to his purity of aim and earnestness, to the value of his labors, and to the great importance of the movement with which he is connected. Mr. Martineau spoke well, as he almost always does. He attached very little importance to the religious labors of Englishmen in India. He thought that a very poor form of Christianity had been taught by the missionaries, and exemplified by the rulers and the men who had gone there to make money. So he thought that the Hindu soul, in its own lonely thought and aspiration, must find God, and how to make life true and noble. It seemed to me that he did not allow enough to the influence of Christianity, and to the contact of the Western or Christian civilization with Hindu thought and life. Dr. Mullens, the Secretary of the London Missionary Society, who had himself been a missionary in India, gave his personal testimony to the importance of the great movement now going on in that country. Mr. Sanderson, who had been a Wesleyan missionary in Calcutta twenty years, spoke to the same effect, only more strongly. He virtually admitted that all the missionary effort put forth in India has yet, so far as can be seen, made very little impression. One of the best speeches, because the freest and boldest, was made by Dr. Marks, a Jewish professor. He said that whatever their guest's influence may yet be in India, it has been excellent in England, through bringing about that remarkable meeting. But the principal speech, as far the most interesting one, was that of Chunder Sen himself. He spoke for an hour with much force and propriety, using the Queen's English remarkably well. He was thoroughly educated in the Calcutta College, and is quite at home in English history and literature. Though he did not overlook the abuses of power, the injustice and tyranny that have appeared in the English occupancy of India, he spoke warmly and emphatically in favor of the government and influence of England as a whole in that country. It has undoubtedly been of the highest value. He spoke very strongly of the influence of the Bible on the educated thought and life of the Hindus. He gave no very flattering account of missionary labor, nor of the moral and religious life of the English in India. The rival sects have so fought and wrangled over their different opinions and dogmas, that the people of India have been bewildered. He said that, were Christ himself fairly presented to the people, he would be revered and loved for the greatness of his life and words, but as for the dogmas they did not want them. Then the miserably poor life lived by many who bore the Christian name in India was a sad stumbling-block. He said that he had made the long voyage to England, not to study theology,—he cared nothing about their doctrines,—but to study the religious and moral life of England. He wanted to see the practical working of their religion, and asked them to show him their best."

As we said last week, Chunder Sen will probably come to America. He has been officially invited to be present at the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association; and we have a slight hope, though, we are sorry to say, only a slight hope, that he may reach this country in season. He will meet a warm welcome here, not only from our Association but from the liberal and progressive minds of the general community. The Independent closes a very fair and cordial article on his position and work in India with a fraternal invitation to him to extend his journey to this land. Since public attention is now called to him and his views, our readers may be glad to be reminded that in the Annual Report of the Free Religious Association for 1868 is a very interesting letter from his own hand to the Secretary of the Association, giving the history and principles of the native Hindu movement of which he is now the recognized leader.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOTT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOTT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

Two little mischievous children, formerly living in Brunswick, used to attend church quite regularly. They never could sit still. When very restless, some one, if the parents were not present, would give them a bit of candy to keep them quiet. On one Sunday, various attempts had been made to secure the candy; not succeeding, the sister said to her little brother—"Let us wiggle, and then she will give us some candy." The wiggle was a perfect success.

"FOLLOWING CHRIST."

[Read to the Unitarian Society, Dover, N. H., Oct. 27, 1867.]

"Follow me."

MATTHEW, xvi, 24.

These words, taken with their context, are plainly the command of Jesus, addressed to his immediate hearers, to acknowledge their allegiance to him as the true Messianic King of the Jews,—the great sovereign anointed by God to rule and restore his "chosen people,"—in one word, as Peter had just declared, the "Christ of God." They were a summons to his disciples to take their place at his side, prepared for all dangers and sacrifices, and to obey his authority as that of the vicegerent of God. "Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Jesus, if his words are here truly reported, imagined that his kingdom would be established in the life-time of his hearers; and the command,—"Follow me,"—was addressed to them alone. It is doubtless hard to shake off the spectacles of preconception with which we read these words; yet nothing can be more certain than that, as Jesus meant them, they contain no reference to the present time. The claim of perpetual Lordship, on which the command was based, was itself a mistake, a misreading of the laws of human development, a misinterpretation of old prophecies found in the Hebrew sacred books. But, as reported, the command was so manifestly limited to the immediate hearers of Jesus, that even those who submit to his Lordship, as ordained of God, should not feel themselves bound by this particular injunction.

There is, however, another sense of the words, commonly but erroneously supposed to be their true sense, which would bind every soul accepting his Lordship to obey them. They are commonly understood to be addressed, not to that age, but to all ages,—not to the disciples or the Jews, but to all men. When Jesus said,—"Follow me,"—he is thought to have said neither more nor less than this:—"Follow my example; settle all questions of duty by an appeal to that; let my life be a perpetual standard of reference to which your lives shall be strictly conformed; let your conduct be habitually compared with mine; make it the great aim of all your efforts to reproduce my character in yours." Thus interpreted, the command is universal, and binds every soul to obedience, provided Jesus is indeed the spiritual Lord of Humanity, and had authority to issue any universal command whatever.

But this I must deny,—not out of captiousness, or wantonness, or spirit of bravado,—but rather out of my clearest conviction and sincerest religion. I acknowledge no "Leader" but truth, no "Lord" but the infinite and indwelling God; I deny the right of any man, even the best man that ever lived, to bind my conscience in any way whatsoever, to impose upon me any new moral obligation, to overstep even by the breadth of a hair the sacred boundaries of my own individuality. All human duties grow out of human relations to universal moral laws; the best example ever set can but exhibit and illustrate these relations as they ought to be in that particular life, without in any degree becoming to other lives the source of new obligations. Why should I do this or that, because somebody else has done it before me? Have we no better business than to be copyists of other men? Shall we mortgage ourselves to any hero, or follow slavishly in the tracks of any saint? It is the sure mark of mediocrity to imitate. In painting, in sculpture, in music, in architecture, in poetry, men applaud him as a genius who neglects the "old masters," and dares to originate; but in religion, in the shaping of character, they inculcate the most servile uniformity, and demand endless repetitions of a single type. Yet it is in religion, above all things, that the soul can least afford to imitate. To be original in art is to be a genius,—to be original in life is but to be a man. We can dispense with genius,—but who can dispense with manhood? Copied character is no character; imitated goodness is at the best a counterfeit.

Doubtless, in its place imitation is excellent and appropriate; it is only by degrees that the soul can learn to live from itself,—to be bravely yet modestly independent; and until that lesson is learned, it must be content to imitate. If, however, we are grown men and women, it is high time for us to be ourselves, not second editions of somebody else. Leave imitation to children and monkeys. Have we no ideal within us, that we must hunt for one in the past? Deference to example is neglect of our own individuality, God never duplicates a human soul; and if it seeks to reproduce the character of Jesus, it is as if one should twist and pinch his features into horrible grimace, in the absurd endeavor to look like Napoleon or Shakespeare. Naturally and simply to develop the individual difference that distinguishes me from all mankind, and at the same time to obey the universal humanity common to all the race, is my highest duty; and in no other way can I fulfil the purpose of Infinite Wisdom in creating me an individual man. The great curse of civilization is a tendency to imitate; let us dare to resist it,—to be non-conformists,—to be ourselves. Life is not a beaten road, once for all engineered for all men by a great Exemplar; we journey alone through untravelled regions, and must each of us strike out a path for himself. In the calculation of our course amidst scenes unknown before, we might as well determine it by tossing up a copper, as by appealing to example; there is no example to appeal to. "Follow me,"—did Jesus say? I must frankly confess to you, friends, I cannot obey any such behest. I cannot tell whither he went, nor stop to ask whither he would have gone. I stand daily in new situations, without precedent or parallel of any kind in his experience, at least as reported in his meagre biographies; and what am I to do? I have no leisure for long study,—I must act. Shall I choose my path by sheer guess-work, conjecturing another's choice by imagination? Or shall I consult my inner guide, making my own choice by principle? Are not conscience and reason, telling me what I ought to do, a wiser monitor than fancy, telling me what Jesus might possibly have done?

It is well to look at this matter a little more closely. When people tell us to "follow the example of Christ," they may mean either of three things. They may mean,—"Do as Christ did,"—or, "Do as Christ in your place would have done,"—or, "Do as the spirit of Christ would prompt you to do." Let us see if, in either of these meanings, we can really obey the supposed command—"Follow me."

1. "Do as Christ did." But what did he do? According to the records, he travelled from place to place, preaching and conversing, healing the sick, driving out devils, restoring the blind, cleansing the lepers, raising the dead, fasting in the wilderness, feeding the multitudes, walking on the waters, stilling the tempests,—shall we imitate such things? No one can urge this. Yet if, in any mechanical way, we attempt to do what he did, we fall into the folly of the poor foreign enthusiast I saw in Pennsylvania, who rambled over the country at large, tried to fast his forty days and forty nights, and, when asked why he did not comb his hair and wash his face, replied there was no record that Jesus ever washed! The mechanical imitation of Jesus must land us in similar absurdity.

But if, in a little less slavish manner, we try to find examples in his conduct to guide our own, we are at once confronted with the greatest difficulties. First of all is the grave doubt how far the gospels truly portray his precise actions,—a doubt which, in the present state of Biblical knowledge, he is a rash man who pretends to solve. Although, beyond question, we have in the gospels mingled elements of truth and fiction, we cannot with any surety separate the two; and in this uncertainty it is perilous indeed to stake our moral characters on the acuteness of our conjectures. To act as we merely guess Jesus acted, is to act with no guide but our own guess. Next, even supposing these historic doubts of the record wholly cancelled on larger knowledge of it, there still remains the impossibility of comparing that age with this. The trials, temptations, and difficulties of Jesus were so peculiar,—the atmosphere of the times, the social customs, the habit of thought, the state of civilization, were so unlike our own,—that we are wholly foiled, if we attempt to derive from his special doings much light upon our own. The result is pretty sure to be bewilderment, if not mistake. The way in which men differ about the true meaning of his alleged sayings,—the endless disputes about the interpretation of single texts, and the tenor of whole passages,—should convince us of this. It surely cannot be safe to take the conduct of Jesus in his particular acts as a guide to our own conduct, until men approach something like harmony of opinion in regard to them. We must at least have the facts made plain, before we could safely model our conduct upon them. It is evident, therefore, that we cannot "follow the example of Christ" in the sense of doing as he did, without making ourselves the mechanical slaves of the letter, and at the same time adopting a letter about which the wisest and best men are unable even to approach agreement. We sacrifice our individuality to get a guide, without getting our guide, after all.

2. Is it, then, any easier to interpret the command "Follow me," as signifying—"Do as I should have done in your circumstances?" Do we thereby get a comprehensible rule of action, and find in the example of Jesus any real clew to our own practical duty? I have shown that we cannot know precisely what he did, and, even if we knew, could not do as he did without most servile imitation. It is quite as easy to show that, if we try to adopt a larger rule, and aim to follow his example in the sense of doing as he would have done in our situation, we are as far as ever from attaining a real standard of life. There is nothing harder than to foretell how another person will act in any given emergency; and this difficulty increases in proportion as the person rises above the dead level of mediocrity. We may perhaps conjecture how an average man will act under given circumstances, because we live in the midst of average men, and learn by observation to understand the average character, in at least some degree. But in proportion as a man rises above the average character, he rises above our opportunities of observation, and our conjectures become correspondingly liable to mistake. Especially if he rises above our own characters, as Jesus beyond question did rise, then his action under any supposed circumstances becomes a hopeless enigma; neither outward observation nor inward experience gives any clew to it; and to pretend to make what would have been his example in any given case the rule of our own conduct, is the very pinnacle of folly and presumption. Who shall dare to say what Jesus would have done if he had lived in our day, and been placed in precisely your or my situation? Would he have thought our commonplace thought, said our commonplace word, done our commonplace deed? Could we divine what would have been his example, without being as great as he? Clearly not; then how claim to make his imagined example the rule of our action?

Perhaps you may say,—"We can be sure of his example at least so far as this,—he would, if placed in our situation, at least always have done right." Hold, friend! what whispered that in your ear? How do you know that to be true? Jesus never was in our situation,—never gave us, therefore, an example of doing right in it; whence, then, do you get his imaginary example of doing right in untried circumstances? From your own moral nature alone, whispering that the right ought always to be done; you yourself create the very example which you fancy to be your guide. In other words, not Jesus, but your own conscience, is the real guide of your conduct; conscience declares that the right ought to be done in all circumstances, and therefore you infer that Jesus, if placed in your circumstances, would do right. You are as sure that you ought to do right without his supposed example as with it. If, moreover, you go beyond this vague injunction to do right, and try to learn what is right in your case, you get no help in trying to imagine what Jesus would have done. The most you can do is by your own wisdom to decide what is right, and then say,—"Jesus would have done that." You have to imagine his example, after all, and cannot make it any wiser or purer than your own imagination; you might, therefore, omit all this reference to him altogether, and decide at once by your own faculties what you ought to do.

Hence I say, you cannot obey the command—"Follow me!"—in the sense of doing what Jesus would have done; for, in the first place, you cannot tell what one so much greater and wiser would have done,—and, in the next place, if you try to imagine this, you walk purely by the light of your own imagination, not of his example. It is just as well then, and better, to spare yourself the labor of creating this supposed example; it is only your own ideal under a disguise, which is more beautiful, more divine, when the mask is stripped off. Let us shun all self-delusion,—we cannot, we do not, govern ourselves by anybody's example, unless we slavishly imitate what we see done before our eyes; in all other cases, we create the fancied governor. Let us, having become men and women, put away childish things, and reverently, yet fearlessly, accept the grave responsibility of conscious self-government.

3. There is one more way, however, to interpret the command,—"Follow me," namely, "Do as the spirit of Christ would prompt you to do." If this means simply, let the same spirit of obedience to principle, self-sacrifice, courage, and love, which controlled Jesus, also control us,—well and good. But then I must say that this is not, in any true sense, "following his example," it is following the spirit which made his example,—obeying the law which he also obeyed. If, however, the implication is intended that we cannot be ruled by this spirit, unless as directly revealed in Jesus' life,—that it is, in any peculiar sense, his spirit,—it is quite time to say, No! The spirit of love and obedience to principle is not his spirit,—it is simply the right spirit, the noble, the beautiful, the divine spirit. It existed before Jesus, and exists now where he was never heard of; it is co-eval with God himself, for it is God's spirit, revealing itself in man. It is no more the "spirit of Christ" in a property sense, than the air I breathe is my air. In breathing the air, my child cannot be said to "follow my example," simply because I happened to breathe it first, or because my lungs inhale more of it than his; we both of us merely obey the law of our nature, and together breathe God's air. So it is with the spirit of love and purity and unselfish devotion; Jesus breathed it before you and me, and inhaled it deeper, but it is not therefore his spirit, nor given to us by him; God gives it to us all. If we live consciously by this, we live according to no spiritual pattern, we photograph no man's character, we imitate no man's example. Jesus followed the example of nobody else; we cannot really follow his, except in dispensing with all example, and obeying the spirit within.

If, dear friends, it were God's law that we should shape our lives after the fashion of any example, by all means would I urge you to let Jesus be your Exemplar. No life that I know of seems to me more fresh or manly or holy, no character better worthy of imitation, if imitation were not the extinction of character itself. But so highly do I prize the independence which comes from true life in God,—so precious do I count the spiritual vitality which emancipates itself from all human Lordship,—that I must proclaim aloud my conviction that subservience to example is to-day the great curse of society. Men are not taught to trust or respect themselves; their reason and conscience are not trained to act alone; adults in business and politics, they are infants in spiritual life. Being taught to imitate, they commonly imitate the nearest, not the best example. Let us be manly in character and in religion; let us shake off the swaddling-clothes of the church and get out of our cradles; let us respect our own faculties, and trust them as competent to guide us to high character, without fancying ourselves tied to any one's example. Grateful for all good influences, let us not be the slave of any; for slavery, even to good influences, is evil, and ruins that sturdy, hardy independence which is the root of all noble character, both in man and woman. "Admirable mimics," says Emerson, "have nothing of their own." Self-reliance is true humility, if in self, and the powers of self, we discern the indwelling God; and independence of all example, cherished in the right spirit, is simply more complete dependence upon him.

Miscellaneous.

ECCLIASTICAL SEPULTURE.

[From "The Law of Burial—Report to the Supreme Court by S. B. Ruggles, Referee. Albany, 1858."]

Christianity had made some progress in Britain while yet remaining under the Roman power, but does not appear to have mingled itself materially with the governmental administration. The Saxon conquerors, who succeeded the Roman in the fifth century, brought in Paganism for about one hundred and fifty years; but it was extirpated about the close of the sixth century by the vigor of St. Augustin, under the pontificate of Gregory the Great. It is quite apparent, that the clear-sighted incumbents of the Holy See by that time had perceived, in the burial of the dead, a very important and desirable element of spiritual dominion. It was the sagacity, not less than the piety of that distinguished pontiff, which led him to introduce the custom of burial in churches, to the end, as he declared, that the relatives and friends of the dead might be induced, more frequently to pray for their repose. Occasional interments, in places of worship or their immediate vicinity, had indeed been made by the early Christians, as far back as the reign of Constantine; but it was not until after the pontificate of Gregory, and the rapid increase by his successors of the temporal power of the Church, that burial-grounds were generally attached to places of worship, and subjected by formal consecration to ecclesiastical authority.

The judicial history of the Romish Church in England, from the sixth century to the thirteenth, exhibits its earnest efforts and its steady and all but uninterrupted progress not only in strengthening its proper spiritual power, but in obtaining the exclusive temporal, judicial cognizance of all matters touching the ecclesiastical edifices and their appendages, and especially their places of burial. During that period, the office of sepulture, originally only a secular duty, came to be regarded as a spiritual function—so much so, that the secular courts, in the cases as early as the 20th and 21st, Edward I., cited in 2 Inst., 363, in determining whether or not a building was a church, inquired only whether it had sacraments and sepulture.

It is generally stated that burial in church-yards was introduced into England by Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury in the year 750. The form of their consecration is even yet preserved, in some of its essential features, by the Established Church. The invocation, as given by Burns in his Ecclesiastical Law, 1 vol. p. 334, after declaring that the duty has been taught by God, "through his holy servants, in all ages, to assign places where the bodies of the saints may rest in peace and be preserved from all indignities," asks the Divine acceptance "of the charitable work, in separating the portion of ground to that good purpose."

The sagacious policy of the Roman ecclesiastics, in attaching the place of interment to the church, was duly strengthened by the stringent provision of the canon law, which prohibited heretics from Christian burial. To repose in any but consecrated earth, soon came to be ignominious; and thus the church-yard became a vital portion of the material machinery, for enforcing spiritual obedience and theological conformity. Nor was the power neglected. It governed Europe for several hundred years, and it was but shortly before the Protestant Reformation in England, that one Tracy, being publicly accused in convocation, of having expressed heretical sentiments in his will, and being found guilty, a commission was issued to dig up his body, which was done accordingly. Burns, Eccl. Law, 266.

During the early portion of the Anglo-Saxon period, the power of the clergy over the dead was kept in check, by uniting the lay with the clerical order in the ecclesiastical tribunals; but their jurisdictions were separated soon after the Norman conquest, and the effect upon the dead is plainly discernible. The exclusive power of the ecclesiastics, denominated in legal phrase, "ecclesiastical cognizance," became not only executive, but judicial. It was executive, in taking the body into their actual corporeal possession, and practically guarding its repose in their consecrated grounds; and it was judicial, as well in deciding all controversies involving the possession or the use of holy places, or the peculiar emoluments which they yielded, as in a broader field, in adjudicating who should be allowed to lie in consecrated earth, and, in fact, who should be allowed to be interred at all. The deplorable superstition that could induce a people to entrust such a power to any but its civil government and civil courts, is amazing, and yet we find the sturdy English nation, under the government of William of Normandy, stripping their cherished Anglo-Saxon courts of all power to protect the dead, and yielding them up blindfold to priestly cognizance. As Sir William Blackstone well says, it was a "fatal encroachment" on the ancient liberties of England. Eight centuries have not sufficed to repair the mischief. Anselm and Becket, in modern garb, live even yet.

The deep-seated, fundamental idea of human burial, lies in the mingling our remains with the mother earth. The "dust to dust! earth to earth! ashes to ashes!" of the Church,—echoing, in deeper solemnity the "ter pulvere" of Horace, and hallowing the dying wish of Cyrus,—finds a universal response, in the holiest instincts of man in every age. Here then was the tender spot for subtle power to touch. Logically pursuing this idea, the ecclesiastical process of excommunication prohibited burial in the earth at all, whether consecrated or not. The precise words of the formula, as used in the tenth century, gave over the body of the contumacious offender, for food to the fowls of the air and beasts of the field. "Sint cadavera eorum, in escam volatilibus coeli, et bestiis terrae." In some instances the sentence was more definite and specific, confining the corpse to the hollow trunk of a tree, "in concavo trunco repositum." The essence of the idea being to keep the body out of the earth and on the surface, it was sometimes figuratively expressed, in monkish rhetoric, by "the burial of an ass,"—or by a stronger and more characteristic image, as "a dunghill." "Sepultura asini sepeliantur, et in sterquilinum superficiem terrae sint." The afflicted but sinful laity, to hide the horror of the spectacle, were wont, at times, to cover the festering dead with a pile of stones, thereby rearing a tumulus, or "bloc;" so that the process came to be commonly known, in mediæval Latin, as "imblocare" corpus. Du Cange Glossary, "Imblocare."

The same dominant idea of the unfitness of spiritual offenders to pollute the earth, can be distinctly traced through the judicial, ecclesiastical condemnations for several centuries. John Huss and Jerome of Prague, being burned at the stake for heresy, early in the fifteenth century, under the ecclesiastical order of the Council of Constance, their ashes were not allowed to mingle with the earth, but were cast into the Rhine.

The legal process of scattering the ashes of the heretic, was evidently a very significant and cherished feature in the ecclesiastical code of procedure, and it was executed in the different portions of Christendom, with all attainable uniformity and precision. Within its comprehensive range, it embraced not only the ashes of the heretic freshly burnt, but the mouldering remains of any who had been suffered, through mistake or inadvertency, to slip into their graves. Wickliffe, the first English translator of the Scriptures, had ventured, in life, to question certain points of dogmatic theology, but, dying in his bed, in the year 1384, had been allowed to sleep forty-one years in a churchyard in Leicestershire. The assembled dignitaries of the Council of Constance, after duly disposing of the ashes of Huss and Jerome, judicially declared the heresy of Wickliffe, and his bones were accordingly dug up and burnt, and the ashes thrown into the river Avon, in the due exercise of the executive branch of ecclesiastical cognizance, in the year 1425 of the Christian era.

Nor was the ecclesiastical cognizance of the dead confined to delinquents of low degree, or in the plainest walks of life. The Emperor of Germany, Henry the Fourth, the victor of more than sixty battles, dying under papal excommunication by Hildebrand, the seventh Gregory, was compelled to lie for five years unburied, in the very sight of the majestic cathedral of Spire, which his father had commenced, and he had completed.

But the high and transcendent energy of ecclesiastical cognizance was completely developed in England, in the thirteenth century, when it reached its culminating point, with the whole kingdom as the defendant. From the year 1207 to the year 1213, the Interdict of Innocent the Third, kept out of their lawful graves all the dead, from the channel to the Tweed. No funeral bell in the kingdom was permitted to toll; the corpses were thrown into ditches, without prayer or hallowed observance, and the last drop of priestly malice and vengeance was exhausted, in compelling all who wished to marry to solemnize the ceremony in the church-yard.

It was during this unbridled career of papal aggrandizement through these dark and dismal ages, that the ancient, civil courts of England gradually lost their original, legitimate authority over places of interment, as private property, and their proper and necessary control over the repose of the dead. The clergy, monopolizing the judicial power over the subject, burial was committed solely to ecclesiastical cognizance, while the secular courts, stripped of all authority over the dead, were left to confine themselves to the protection of the monument and other external emblems of grief, erected by the living. But these they guarded with singular solicitude. The tombstone, the armorial escutcheons, even the coat and pennons, and ensigns of honor, whether attached to the church edifice or elsewhere, were raised as "heirlooms" to the dignity of inheritable estates and descended from heir to heir, who could hold even the parson liable for taking them down or defacing them.

BROUGHT TO JUDGMENT.

[From the N. Y. Tribune.]

The Boston school of religious Radicals, or Transcendentalists, or Skeptics, or whatever be the designation given to the persons calling themselves Free Religionists, is now challenged by an abler opponent than it has yet encountered. Dr. McCosh, the distinguished Scottish scholar, metaphysician, and orthodox divine, who came to this country a year ago to assume the Presidency of Princeton College, recently confronted the Free Religionists in Boston itself with several discourses of great power and effect. The controversy in which he has taken up the championship of Orthodox Protestant Christianity against them is one in which we do not propose to take any part. But we cannot help expressing our admiration of the bold attitude which Dr. McCosh has assumed, and of the way in which he has opened his assaults—so far as we can judge by the reports of his discourses in the Boston papers.

That the so-called "Boston School" of Religion or of Skepticism—whichever it may be called—will derive benefit from the demonstrations of this orthodox thinker, is not at all unlikely. It has its weaknesses—its great weaknesses—and will be none the worse for having a strong hand laid upon them. It will be better for having its "ideas" tried by the principles of consciousness, its "reason" tested by the rules of logic, and its somewhat nebulous "sentiments" and "intuitions" examined by the laws of thought and of the mind. There is no one better able to do this service than Dr. McCosh, who belongs to what may be called the new order of schoolmen—an intellectual order which, primarily metaphysical, is alive to the value of scientific demonstration and historical criticism. In his present controversy he has the advantage of a very thorough knowledge of the adversary's ground. He has not only been a deep student of Coleridge, who is held responsible for most of the "free religious" thought of the present day—he not only understands the skeptical-religionists of the French, English and German schools, but he has tried to comprehend the great lights of the Boston school itself, from Channing, Parker and Emerson to the leaders of the Radical Club. Being thus qualified, he challenges their first principles as well as their latest results,—conceding not a hair's breadth of the old orthodox ground on which he himself stands, but determined rather to drive them to their last position, where conclusions must ultimately be tried.

The "Boston School" has no pre-eminent leader to put forward in its defense—no great controversialist like Channing or Parker. It has in its ranks, however, a number of men and women of fine intellect and high powers. We have no doubt that these will be quite ready to defend their ground against this new assailant. It would be difficult to name any one as fit to be their leader; but if no strong man comes forward to defend the citadel of "Free Religion," it will probably find a defender not unworthy its renown in that deep thinker, uncommon scholar, and courageous woman, Mrs. Howe.

THE BROAD CHURCH.

[From the N. Y. Independent.]

In the editorial correspondence of The Woman's Journal, from Dayton, Ohio, is the following paragraph:—

"Hon. Mr. Vallandigham called at the hotel to give in his adherence to the cause of woman's suffrage. But, as he was very exclusive in his attentions, selecting only Miss Anthony for the honor of a tele-a-tele, and bestowing on her alone the light of his countenance, we shall decline giving him our vote when he runs for Congress; and so agreed others similarly neglected. He 'can't come in.'"

Perhaps we do not exactly catch the intent of the excellent lady who penned this paragraph; but, if she means that because Mr. Vallandigham has made a bad record on the negro question he is, therefore, not to be permitted to make a good record on the woman question, we non-concur.

The true spirit in which the woman's suffrage movement should be conducted is (in our judgment) a spirit of catholic welcome toward all new-comers, from whatsoever quarter and of whatsoever name. Mr. Vallandigham has achieved an unenviable notoriety in the political history of the last ten years. But the question on which he stranded his reputation has since, like Blossom Rock, in San Francisco harbor, been blown out of the way; and now Mr. Vallandigham has, if he chooses, a chance to float his ship once more.

As for ourselves, we have no right to determine who can or who cannot "come in to" the woman's movement. We do not stand at the door of this reform, as a ticket-taker at an opera, examining the credentials of the attendants. It would show a more commendable liberality (according to our way of thinking) to give everybody a free pass; yea, to persuade them to come; yea, go out into the highways and hedges and compel them in, as in the Scripture parable.

So far as we have any personal agency in giving direction to the woman's suffrage cause, we shall insist that Democrats and Republicans be treated exactly alike. What would have been thought in London the other day, if, when the parliamentary vote was taken on the bill for woman's suffrage, some Liberal had said to some Tory—for instance, Mr. Bright to Mr. Disraeli:—"You are not welcome to give your vote on our side: we do not invite you to join us; you can't come in."

Of course, we are not dictating a rule for others. If past political antipathies are still of such strength in the hearts of certain Republicans that they cannot, on a new question, which is totally distinct from all former issues, co-operate with Democrats, we can only say that we do not share such feelings. Every great cause is for all who love it, honor it, and work for it. And if Mr. Vallandigham, or any other man, whatever his past political record concerning negro slavery, wishes now to give his allegiance to woman's suffrage, he shall not lack a right hand of fellowship so long as we have an opportunity to offer him our own.

RELIGION AND THE CONSTITUTION.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

The omission of all allusion to the Divine Being as the author of government and law, and to religious obligation as the foundation of men's responsibility under government and law, is calling forth increased comment. At several periods within the last fifty years memorials, to Congress for a proposed amendment by insertion of such recognition have been suggested. Since the late war the numerous amendments called for have revived this discussion. It has even been proposed to make this subject one for special consideration at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance to be held at New York next autumn, at which representatives from different countries of Europe will be present.

It is important to observe that this omission was a matter of profound thought at the time. Its main design is fully alluded to by Washington in an address made shortly after. It was called forth by an address to Washington of the "First Presbytery of the Eastward," which included Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and is dated Newburyport, Mass., October 28, 1789. Alluding to the omission, particularly in the assertion of civil rights, which had been simply supplied in the amendments immediately suggested and adopted with the Constitution, the Presbytery say:—

"Among these we never considered the want of a religious test, that grand engine of persecution in every tyrant's hand; but we should not have been alone in rejoicing to have seen some explicit acknowledgment of the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent, inserted somewhere in the Magna Charta of our country."

To this Washington replied as follows:—

"The tribute of thanksgiving which you offer to the gracious Father of Lights for his inspiration of our public councils with wisdom and firmness to complete the National Constitution, is worthy of men who, devoted to the pious purposes of religion, desire their accomplishment by such means as advance the temporal happiness of their fellow-men. And here, I am persuaded, you will permit me to observe that the path of true piety is so plain as to require but little political direction. To this consideration we ought to ascribe the absence of any regulation respecting religion from the Magna Charta of our country. To the guidance of the ministers of the Gospel this important object is, perhaps, more properly committed. It will be your care to instruct the ignorant and to reclaim the devious; and in the progress of morality and science to which our government will give every furtherance, we may confidently expect the advancement of true religion, and the completion of our happiness."

It is an indication of the tendencies that prevailed at the origin of the Federal Constitution in the different sections of the country that the constitutions of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, New York, Delaware and Maryland directly recognize in their preambles the Divine Being; that those of Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia indirectly refer to the Christian religion by prohibitions of religious tests; while in South Carolina ministers of religion are unfitted by their office for any civil trust.

In the Constitutions of the States since received into the Union, the Divine authority is directly recognized by Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Texas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Kansas. The Christian religion is only directly referred to by Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, Michigan, California, Oregon and West Virginia. Christian ministers are made ineligible to civil office in Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri and Florida; while in Arkansas and Tennessee no one denying the existence of God and of future punishments is allowed to hold office or take an oath. It may be worthy of note that in the Federal Constitution belief in a Deity is indirectly recognized in the provision requiring an oath of the President; and the superior claim of the Christian faith is implied in the excepting of Sunday from the ten days allowed to the President in signing a bill passed by Congress. Nevertheless, every consideration of national harmony and unity imperatively requires that we should keep church and state as wide asunder as possible in our people-controlling government.

A negro alderman at Wilmington, N. C., was called "Anthony" by the counsel in a law case in which he was a witness; but he refused to reply till he was addressed as Mr. Howe, and the Court sustained him.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"THE INDEX is all that can be desired. Don't enlarge it—a pillow, &c.—you know what you said to your windy correspondents."

"Your paper is grand, glorious. I do not see how it can fail to plant the true seed in many a soil rich and ready for bringing forth fruit."

"I pray that Humanity may appreciate THE INDEX. My Ideal has been a divine Humanity on the earth. It is nearer being a realization at this time than ever."

"I know not how to express my satisfaction that THE INDEX lives in my time. That, and the Independent afford me all the religious aliment I get outside my own soul."

"Let me add,—I am pleased with the general tone of THE INDEX and would stand with you for the Truth, Reason, Free Religion, and the highest good of mankind in this present life."

"Enclosed you will find 10 cents, the price of two numbers of THE INDEX. Please send me No. 9, and the paper containing the article entitled 'Grief and its Compensations.' I forget the number of the latter. This article I value extremely, and I should be very sorry not to be able to procure it to take home with me to Ireland."

"I am one of those who consider the Christian religion as good as obsolete, and am glad to hear that a Reverend has been found with courage enough to say so. I enclose five dollars, and desire my name entered on your subscription list for THE INDEX. Send me a copy of your Fifty Affirmations if you have one to spare."

"I found a young widow to-day who had recently lost a lovely daughter of ten years, and is likely to lose another of eight, her last child. I gave her THE INDEX No. 11, for the sake of the consolation contained in your sermon in that paper. You have a difficult case to make out, but much more satisfactory than any attempt I have ever seen from an orthodox standpoint."

"While I have my pen in hand I can't content myself without expressing to you the great value your lectures on Christianity and Free Religion have been to me as a fresh stimulus to life and action. The old trouble about faith in God and a future is beginning to give place to the interests of the present, and to prompt exertion in finding out what is worthy to be done—what I can do. May I say to you that while I am so much refreshed by your paper, and so highly enjoy its pages, I have been somewhat pained, now and then, by the little spice of sarcasm which here and there has crept into its columns. I do not wonder that you should be provoked to it. But I feel sure that in your heart you believe that sweetness and love are the better weapons."

"I am far from endorsing its teachings, or what I look for those to be, but I am anxious to hear what a man of thought can say in this direction, and so I send for your paper as the only means of ascertaining. I hope I shall read it to my benefit, for I have never joined myself to any church as I could not subscribe to the doctrines of any church, for I find my ideas constantly changing. I take the N. Y. Independent and the New Jerusalem Messenger, but I would like your paper added to the list, for nothing is more unlike another than is your paper unlike these in regard to Jesus. And that is the question of questions that has always troubled me, I could not commit myself on any of them. Pardon me for troubling you with these thoughts."

"I received from my friends in the city, the Prospectus of THE INDEX a few days before it was published, and soon after New Year four copies of the new work. After a thorough perusal of them by myself and some of my neighbors I sent them to a lady correspondent. In her letter to me she said, 'I received your estimable letter under date of Jan. 21st, and with it the Prospectus of THE INDEX and four copies of the paper, all directing precisely the right way to essentially benefit me. I think them perfect little gems. May THE INDEX guide thousands (as I think it will) to higher and happier lives. I ardently thank you for them.'"

Poetry.

PICTURES FROM OVID:

V. THE APPROACH OF PHAETHON TO THE EARTH.

In chasms immense wide yawns the thirsty ground,
And rays unwonted pierce the abyss profound,— Dispel the gloom which wraps in sable shroud
The realms of Hades and its shadowy crowd.
The awful sovereigns of this dread domain
Shrink in alarm, with all their ghostly train.
Where late the foam-capped billows of the deep
Heaved with the gale, or lay in transient sleep,
The dreary stretches of a sandy plain
Betray the shallows of the azure main;
While lofty mounts with crags and peaks appear,
And 'midst the Cyclades their summits rear.
The finny tribes that glitter in the sea
In terror seek from fiery death to flee;
The sportive dolphins now no longer dare
To leap and gambol in the scorching air;
The lifeless seals that float upon the brine,
Tossed by the hissing waves, are borne supine.
Lo, Doris, Nereus, Nereids (vain desire!)
In caverns seek to escape the raging fire.
Thrice has gray Neptune, with a threatening brow,
Essayed to raise his arms; compelled to bow
Before the angry flames, three times has he Shrunk back within the bosom of the sea.

TOLEDO BOURBONISM.

It is a disgrace to Toledo that such a protest as the following manly letter from a colored school-boy should be justified by the existing regulations of the Board of Education, which even at this late day forbid the admission of colored children into the same public schools attended by white children. We copy from the Toledo Commercial (May 5), which has repeatedly urged the abolition of such unjust restrictions:—

EDITOR COMMERCIAL:—We see by the action of the Board of Education, that a new colored school is to be established in room No. 3, of the Jefferson Street School House, supposed to be of a higher grade than the one heretofore employed in the education of colored children. This is all very well; but we deny the possibility of a graded school being thus established, where all the higher branches are taught as at the High School.

With all respect for Mrs. Day as a teacher, it is but the truth to say that she knows nothing of the languages whatever, and was compelled to decline a position at Wilberforce on that account.

A few of us—and only a few—have asked admission to such grades as are taught in the High School—not because we wish to be associated in any way with the whites, but because we cannot sufficiently advance in any colored school which is likely to be raised in Toledo. The same scholars who have been attending the former colored school, must necessarily attend the new one, and we who have been alone in different classes do not consider ourselves any better off than we were before. And for this reason, and this alone, have we applied at different times to be relieved of such disabilities and enter at once upon the advantages enjoyed by the whites. But, no! Simply because our color is somewhat darker than that of the more favored ones, we are shamefully excluded from all connection with the public schools and banished off into a corner by ourselves, as if we were something very odious and obnoxious to the human family. We ask, and shall continue to ask, admission to such advantages as are enjoyed by others.

ALONZO A. LOTT.

Some time ago the Akron Beacon alluded to the action of the Board in fitting terms, as follows:—

"The Toledo School Board has finally decided the question of the equal rights of negro children to education in a manner very worthy of Roger B. Taney and 1860. On Monday afternoon the Board voted to bar the children from any school except one for their own color. It's no matter how far from the school the little colored child may live, nor whether it is old enough or strong enough to get to it. It is worth while to note that two of Toledo's oldest and most prominent lawyers, M. R. Waite and John R. Osborn—regard it as entirely competent for the Board to deal impartially and justly with the colored children, agreeing as they substantially do, with ex-Attorney-General Olds, and School Commissioners White and Henkle."

We earnestly second the just demand of Master Lott and other colored children for "admission to such advantages as are enjoyed by others." If the state of public opinion in this largely Republican city is not such as to warrant the Board in acceding to this demand (which we wholly disbelieve), it is high time that it should be reformed; and THE INDEX will do its share in reforming it.

THEORY VERSUS FACT.

In the Radical for May, Mr. Wasson reviews the first of our "Fifty Affirmations," and our subsequent essay in explanation of it, entitled—"The Essence of Religion." When we wrote the essay, we thought we had some ideas on the subject; but after Mr. Wasson's adroit prestidigitation, we are really afraid that we had none to speak of. At any rate, we do not recognize them in his critique. Hereafter we may try to settle this point; but at present we will only comment on a very extraordinary statement. "The atheism of Sakya-muni," says Mr. Wasson, "has been asserted by eminent scholars, whose judgment I am not entitled to controvert, though quite unable to accept it." The reasons for this "inability" we do not know, and cannot imagine. We are accustomed to let questions of fact be settled in our mind by evidence. The testimony of the most competent scholars certainly seems to us decisive in this case, as we have no knowledge of the original sources of information. But perhaps the fact does not harmonize with Mr. Wasson's theories, and this may be the reason for discarding it. As Mr. Lincoln used to say, this "reminds us of a little story." Our youngest boy, then four years old, once proposed to attempt some impossible childish-project. "Well, what are your reasons?" we inquired, suppressing the smile prompted by his proposal. "Oh!" replied the little fellow, with great dignity, "I want to is one reason, and because is another!"

If Mr. Wasson has any better reasons for setting aside the verdict of scholars in a question of scholarship, we fail to see them.

A NEW CHRISTIAN MARTYR.

Zion's Herald (Methodist) thinks the radicals come under the same category with pickpockets and other "light-fingered" gentry:—

"THE TOLEDO INDEX is trying to prove Mr. Lincoln was an infidel. We shall have to say of his infidelity as he said of Grant's whisky, which he wanted for the rest of his Generals,—we should like to have THE INDEX show where we can get more of that sort, for we wish to give it to the infidels of THE INDEX and of his school in and around Boston. Mr. Lincoln fell among these thieves of faith in his early days, but, when President, by many a confession, sought and found the faith of the Christian. May all who seek to bring him down to their Christless level, go and do likewise."

In an account of her recent visit to Toledo, Mrs. Stanton remarks in the Revolution:—

"Such men as Mr. Abbot, Mr. Hepworth, and Mr. Frothingham, are doing a work for humanity that will be better appreciated in the future than in the times in which we live."

Will nobody rush to the relief of Mr. Hepworth, crucified between two "thieves?" His friends must be deeply distressed at his situation, since they will hardly coincide in the opinion of Zion's Herald that all Unitarians are thieves by brevet.

EXPLANATION WANTED.

At the recent election of officers in the Toledo Library Association, one ticket nominated Miss Bangs for Secretary, another Mr. Perigo. Some days previously, Mr. Perigo published a card in the Commercial, positively declining to serve. But, in order to defeat Miss Bang's and "woman's rights," the report was circulated widely that Mr. Perigo would not refuse to act, if elected. Consequently, Mr. Perigo was elected. But he immediately resigned, according to his declaration; and the Executive Board, having the power all in their own hands, have appointed a gentleman as Secretary. If such strategy as this is not small business, we should like to know what is. We call upon the authors of the report above referred to, which secured the defeat of Miss Bangs, to give the authority upon which they circulated it. If this is the manner in which the opponents of "woman's rights" are compelled to proceed, the triumph of "woman's rights" is not far off.

RESULTS OF THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN MICHIGAN.

[From the Detroit Post.]

The result of abolishing capital punishment in the State of Michigan fully justifies that change in the penal code of the State. All that the most strenuous advocate of severe punishment can ask is that a mitigation of it shall not tend to the increase of crime. Everything else cries trumpet-tongued in favor of humanity. If milder judgments cannot be proved guilty of murder, they must be acquitted. It is only necessary to show that the community is not worse for refusing to take life, in order to establish the justice and the righteousness of its less savage mood. Prove satisfactorily and conclusively that it is unnecessary for the State to execute its criminals and those who clamor for blood, cannot in reason be longer heard. If a pound of flesh is all that the law requires for its vindication, every fibre or muscle or atom more cut from the palpitating body must, in the nature of the case, be a violation of both law and justice. Once prove that neither law, nor justice, nor public safety requires a pound, or an ounce, or a grain of flesh, and the State is morally bound to throw the knife away.

But not only has there been no increase in the convictions for murder, but on the whole a decided decrease. Out of sixty-three convicts committed to prison in 1848-49, five were committed for murder, or seven per cent. of the whole number. Out of 250 convicts committed in 1869, two were committed for murder, or eight tenths of one per cent. of the whole. The average per centage of murderers to other convicts since 1847, when capital punishment was abolished, has been one and one-tenth per cent. But during the first eleven years the per centage was two and seven-tenths; during the last eleven years, one and three-tenths, showing a decrease of nearly fifty per cent. in the number of murderers convicted, when the two periods are compared. In other words, the number of convictions for murder during the last eleven years has diminished nearly one-half, as compared with the first eleven years of the period that has elapsed since capital punishment was abolished. In other words, again, these criminal statistics prove that murder has decreased since capital punishment was abolished!

Those who oppose that sort of punishment have a right to claim, therefore, that in Michigan not only has its abolition caused no increase of murder, but that under it murder has actually diminished. Until these statements are refuted by further experience, confinement for life in the State Prison is the severest penalty which will be inflicted upon murder in Michigan.

IS CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE?

"What! Christianity a failure?" is the anxious interrogatory of many a startled one who but half comprehends the drift and purpose of the Free Religious movement. I answer, yes and no. As a finality,—as the highest form of religion,—as the ultimate reach of development,—as the one religion which is to absorb all others and envelope the whole earth, before whose altars "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess,"—it is a failure, and should be so declared.

Yet as an historical phenomenon,—as an onward step toward the truth,—as a nearer approach to a just apprehension of the Divine idea and purpose,—it is a long step in advance of the more ancient religions; and, as such, must ever command the respect and receive the just recognition of mankind.

HEART AND HEAD.

OLATHE, Kansas, 21 March, 1870.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your publication has met a want I have long felt. Yet after clearing away the rubbish of orthodoxy, we need something positive, something substantial to take its place. It is comparatively easy to destroy and demolish; but it is another thing to build up something better in its place. Your ideas about the worth of Human Nature, its gradual development from a state little above the animal to its present condition, more especially the gradual development of the religious sentiment through the historic ages, are in accordance with our own. But the question arises, how should we best develop this self-respect, this higher nature of man?

Will not a knowledge of Nature's laws, as indicated by the sciences of geology, astronomy, chemistry, &c., develop a true conception of the Divine Creator better than any impulsive sentiment? In other words, is not the Creator best seen through his laws? The Spiritualist contends that Intellect alone will not develop Religion,—that Intellect is cold and barren without Sentiment.

But is it not a fact that, when we recognize the laws which have operated in forming the earth, the laws which govern the heavenly bodies, we shall be irresistibly impressed with the true sentiment of religion,—that we shall spontaneously assume that attitude of worship which Martineau says our nature assumes "not for a purpose, but from an emotion?"

Spiritualists contend that communications from the other world are essential to develop this true religious sentiment; but such appeals to the sentiment without enlightening the intellect are transitory and deceptive. Nature's laws we find to be inflexible, unvarying and always to be depended on; Spiritual developments are, to say the least, uncertain and unreliable.

The geologist who is acquainted with the "earth's history of herself" could never be imposed upon by such an absurdity as the Mosaic account of the Creation.

Is it not, then, the most effectual way to teach man true ideas of God—true religion, to acquaint him with Nature's laws,—with astronomy, geology, chemistry, the science of mind, &c., &c.?

Respectfully and fraternally yours,
J. E. SUTTON.

THE CONSOLIDATION PROPOSAL.

F. E. ABBOT:

MY FRIEND,—Your candid proposal for a plan of union for the "American" and "National" Woman's Suffrage Associations was published, as you will see, in the journals of both Societies. Let me state a difficulty in the way of its present fulfillment, namely, the fact that the American Association cannot take any such step until its annual meeting next November.

Whether the merging of the "National" Society in the new Association, with a new list of officers and Mr. Tilton as President, will help this union or not, remains to be seen. Mrs. Stanton refused to take office in the new Society, and Mrs. Lucy Stone has accepted no official position in the American Association,—both for kindred and commendable reasons; and in the public meetings last week, in New York, letters of mutual good feeling were sent and responded to between the Presidents of both Societies—Rev. H. W. Beecher and Theodore Tilton—approved by the meetings over which they presided.

Thus we have two Societies, differing somewhat in their mode of organization; and in both are persons of eminent ability and excellent personal character.

Thus it must be for some months at least; and meanwhile it is to be hoped that each will stimulate the other to good works, "in order," as Mr. Beecher happily said, "that the two may do twice as much as one," and that each and all may avoid carping criticism.

If union comes, all well. If different views of organization and different modes of action prevent, let each take its own path and work in its own way, and let us all help in whatever good thing is done.

I write by no authority or suggestion, and am but an unofficial worker in this good cause. While I would like to see a union, I shall not consider two National Societies as two calamities, and believe that, come what may, with our State Societies, with our private and personal efforts, and with the grand tide of feeling in favor of equal rights for all, the work will go bravely on.

So let us possess our souls in patience; make due allowance for that individuality of character which is so marked among reformers, and which makes it difficult for them always to act together; and, if union can come honorably and fairly, really welcome it. If not, let each "gang its ain gait," as the Scotch say, in the confidence that, after all, the truth will conquer, and the good work we all want will be done.

I write thus after attending part of the sessions of both conventions last week, in New York.

Truly yours,

G. B. STEBBINS.

"CAN'T STAND THE TEST."

"It is a remarkable fact that these cold and barren negations . . . can never stand the test of trial,—the stress of great responsibility, upon the one hand, and of disappointment and bitter loss upon the other,—can never satisfy the human heart when smarting under the sense of bereavement."—[Article from Springfield (Mass.) Republican on "Lincoln's Religious Views," in THE INDEX of May 2.]

With what a mental smack of self-gratulation the orthodox mind dwells upon this final and most convincing argument! After this absolutely undeniable assertion, the "unbeliever" may as well be dumb. What can one say, when Christian arrogance arrives at such a pitch as this? And yet, how universally and ingeniously is this assumption made by our evangelical brethren! How constantly are held up to the imagination of the young the peace and joy and happiness that attend the Christian's course—what fortitude under trial, what glory in death! And how in contrast with this is pictured the course of the unbeliever (i. e., the man who, however strong his faith in the Eternal Beneficence, rejects the Christian "plan of salvation")! How tempest-tossed and unsatisfactory his life—how wretched his death! One cannot but observe, however, that this is the same sort of argument so constantly and successfully urged by Catholics against all the numberless sects of Protestantism, which, drifting unanchored and rudderless upon the sea of popular opinion, know not in one age what their followers will believe in the next. Verily, there is nothing that can be safely depended on, nothing in the wide world absolutely reliable, but death and the taxes—and Rome!

Lincoln turned Christian? Perhaps so. Mankind are about alike, in all ages and the world over: in youth striking out boldly and fearlessly upon the current of thought and progress,—then, in middle life, gradually settling down into some quiet eddy that offers a foot-hold for the weary, rest-seeking soul,—and finally, in old age, having become a lodge-nest for all sorts of dirt and rubbish, and overgrown with coarse grasses and noxious weeds, rising at length as an obstruction to block the very current which it once aided and developed. Thanks to an occasional freshet, however, the stream of progress never becomes wholly blocked; and the greater the accumulation of impediments, the more is developed the power of the current, which, once broke loose, only insures their more complete destruction.

To what extent Mr. Lincoln's life followed the general tendency in this respect, the writer knows not; he only recognizes the fact that, with rare exceptions, youth is radical and old age conservative; that youth is bold, progressive, dissatisfied with the present, laboring for the coming good; while old age, fearful of the future and belittling the present, sees perfection only in the past.

"Cold and barren negations" only, it is true, can never satisfy the human soul. Unbelief, if it leads to no sounder faith, no ultimate truth, is of little worth, and, so far as mental quietude and peace of conscience is concerned, a blind superstition is vastly to be preferred. And perhaps this is the key to the solution of the mental phenomena above referred to: at least, in those cases where the change from progress to a false conservatism is most radical and pronounced. The groping, questioning spirit, if in all its wide wanderings it find no Ararat on which to rest, returns gladly at last to the "ark of safety."

And here let us learn a lesson from the "text" to which our attention has been called. The believer in Free Religion (and by this term we include every religious believer outside the evangelical fold) is too much inclined to dwell upon the negative points of his faith; for while negatives are well enough in argumentation, they furnish a poor substitute for real, vital religion. Let us have more of positive and less of negative truth. Thousands of hungry, inquiring souls there are, still clinging to the rotten hulks of the old religions for no other reason than a mortal dread of more negations,—falsely but naturally fearing that, if Christ and the Bible are thrown overboard, they must henceforth sail without chart or compass,—forgetting that the polar star of truth still shines above, that God yet lives, that he who has the Creator of the universe for his parent and protector is possessed of all things, and that, in the study and contemplation of His character and works, there is abundant food for all hungry, longing souls, a boundless field for holy thought and pious meditation. Let the grand, positive truths of the universe be presented in all their fulness and beauty, and there will be little need for the advocates of Free Religion to rebut the oft-repeated charge of offering only husks for corn, and cold and barren negations as a substitute for the living, vital truths of genuine religion.

SOCRATES AGAIN.

BY J. S.

I have been looking into Grote (Companions of Socrates,) to discover what Socrates meant by maintaining in a certain dialogue,—the Hippias Minor, which some critics reject as spurious,—that the man who does wrong willingly is better than another who does the same unwillingly. For such a doctrine, coming from such a source, is surprising and dismaying enough to those who know Socrates only by reputation as a great teacher and pattern of morality. They do not like to see Socrates employing sophistry against the sophists,—that is, as they think, "casting out devils by the aid of Beelzebub." But everything has two handles, and it is important here to get hold of the right one.

We shall best catch the meaning and intent of Socrates by an example (his own):—

"You, Hippias, are expert in matters of arithmetic; you can make sure of answering truly any question put to you on the subject. You are better on the subject than an ignorant man, who cannot make sure of doing the same. But, as you can make sure of answering truly, so likewise you can make sure of answering falsely, whenever you choose to do so. Now the ignorant man cannot make sure of answering falsely. He may, by reason of his ignorance, when he wishes to answer falsely, answer truly without intending it. You, therefore, the intelligent man and the good in arithmetic, are better than the ignorant and the bad for both purposes,—for speaking falsely and for speaking truly."

What is true about arithmetic is true in other departments also. The only man who can speak falsely whenever he chooses, is the man who can speak truly whenever he chooses. It is better to have the mind of a Bowman who mis-es his mark by design, than that of one who misses when he tries to hit. The mind is plainly a tool in these operations. And "the tools to him who can use them." The meaning is clear to whoever is at pains to understand it. Taken without qualification, and in a moral sense, the doctrine is revolting enough; but taken intellectually, in the artist-sense, or in the explanation which Grote gave but Dr. Clarke did not, and Socrates may be right. At any rate, we should not be swift to condemn, till we are quite sure that we understand him. Socrates has been telling Hippias that he (Socrates) is a stupid person, and confused in mind; and to get rid of confusion,—a greater enemy to truth than error itself,—he appeals to Hippias, assuming that he is wise and can help him out. In the end it turns out that Hippias himself is hopelessly confused, and unable to do anything but reiterate his prime statement; and there Socrates leaves him.

The Hippias Minor, as Mr. Grote observed, is one of those Dialogues of Search, which are distinguished by the absence of any affirmative conclusion; they prove nothing, but only, at the most, disprove one or more supposable solutions. The truth is supposed to be unknown; and all parties, including Socrates, unite in the search, in hunting for the truth, for the right solution or right answer to the question. Do not suppose, however, that any one solution is the right one; or because a man argues on the side of reason and morality, that therefore his arguments may not be overthrown. The cause may be strong, and the arguments weak, or vice versa. The strength of one's cause often bears no proportion to the aid which he can bring to it; and "to be weak" is always "to be miserable." Mr. Lincoln said, "right is might" in our war, and it proved so; but only because the mighty were on the side of the right. Had they been on the wrong side, I fear the old proverb and the old practice would have gone together again. To be right is one thing; to be able to maintain the right is another. And let Hippias remember, in the war of argument with Socrates, that, if he is on the right side, he is not therefore the better man; for in this kind of fighting Socrates has the best of it. Hippias may wince, and say:—"But it will be dreadful, Socrates, if the wilful wrong-doers are to pass for better men than the unwilling." Socrates:—"Nevertheless, it seems so from what we have said." Hippias:—"It does not seem so to me. Really, Socrates, I know not how to concede that to you." Socrates:—"Nor I, how to concede it to myself, Hippias. Yet so it must appear to us, now at least, from the past debate."

That is, the question is not settled yet; the court adjourns, and the case comes up on another hearing.

It is not necessary, then, to defend either Socrates or the particular thesis which he propounds, namely, that he who hurts mankind, or lies, or cheats, willfully, is better than another who does the same without knowing or intending it. Yet there are some who think that a knave is better than a fool. The world generally thinks so; it thinks a wicked man is better than a weak one; because there is some hope of a wicked man, that he may be converted into a good and virtuous man. Vice is corrigible; but not so weakness. And there is scarcely anything so much the parent of mischief in political affairs, or in the social world, as that intellectual confusion which does not discriminate, or see rightly the nature of things, their resemblances and differences.

The intention of the dialogue is to exhibit this confusion in the person of Hippias, who has the better side, but is yet worsted by Socrates. Hippias is forced to admit that Socrates is right in every particular; he goes along with him step by step in the argument, but to refuse take the last step. It has brought him to the edge of an abyss, and he shrinks back from the yawning conclusion. All this is natural enough, but our sympathies are not with Hippias. We smile at his perplexity, though knowing him to be in the right. We imagine, though this is our conceit, that we could have managed the argument better. It is so easy to confute an imaginary opponent, or to correct a mistake,—after you have made it! But if a man will not see, either through inability, or blind devotion to some object, he must take the consequences. Every one has heard the story of Mr. Lincoln's opening the eyes of the blind kitten in Gen. Grant's tent at City Point at the close of the war, and wishing it were as easy a task to open the eyes of his fellow-countrymen. But that which Lincoln wished to do, Socrates often did for his fellow-countrymen of Athens. He opened their eyes. He operated for cataract on the organ of intellectual sight. He cured mental blindness. His method was perfect, though one of great severity. And it procured him more hatred than gratitude. Men like Hippias blamed the method, and by inference the man who used it. They did not blame nor seem conscious of their own defect, which made such a method necessary. Hereafter I shall have something to say of it, and possibly compare or contrast it with the method of teaching by authority.

As a good illustration of what Socrates meant in this dialogue, I will take something which "Warrington" let fall in a spicy letter to the Springfield Republican. It was a good while ago, in reply to Wasson, who had charged that the country was going to the bad under the rule of indiscriminate (i. e. universal) suffrage. "I maintain" says the latter, "that the rule is a bad one; it works badly, so as to throw the government everywhere into the hands of knaves; under its operation, the nation has been and is, politically, a slave to the basest elements. What then? You must either give up the rule, or adhere to it. Give it up, and government by the people, universal suffrage, is confessedly a failure. But if you will adhere to it, and carry it out to its inevitable conclusion, then"—glancing at New York and Washington—"look out for the consequences." "Very well" says Warrington, "I accept the rule and the consequence. I am not frightened at all by this sort of logic. I am ready to maintain that universal suffrage, or, as you are pleased to term it, even scoundrel suffrage, is a good thing. I will prove, in spite of you, that it is better a man should 'vote early and often,' than that he should not vote at all. To test the matter, let us go into our state legislature. The men elected by scoundrel suffrage are there in overwhelming numbers,—in a large majority, we'll suppose. Still there are good men among them, and very likely some ministers. "But," says Warrington, "as far as legislation is concerned, I will swap a minister for a knave any time. Allow that your knave will do wrong by legislation, and the minister means to do right. Yet every other knave is there watching him, and, fearing his neighbor's advantage, holds him in check. And altogether the knaves are held in check by something which men call Public Opinion. For, however they will to hurt mankind by stealing and cheating in legislation, yet they are shrewd enough to foresee that, on the whole, it pays better to legislate right than to legislate wrong. And they know to a dead certainty that, unless they legislate well and wisely to a certain extent, they will be indiscriminately kicked out. On the other hand, it is no libel to suppose a minister, though a good man and wise in his way, ignorant of most matters belonging to legislation; and we know that he is woefully ignorant of human political nature. He legislates wrong without knowing it; or worse, under the mistaken color of doing good or establishing the right. For instance, to save morality by legislation, he would violate liberty,—the surest way to ruin both. He would establish temperance by law, and that without regard to the wishes of the people. Your political knave knows better than this; ergo, the elect by scoundrel suffrage is better than the minister who may be, if he is not, elect by woman-suffrage."

There is one kind of error or ignorance which the great Athenian was the quickest to expose; that is, the presumption which seems to be almost universal that, because a man is wise in his own province, or at home in his own trade or profession, therefore he is fit to give an opinion relating to the business of any other trade or profession. Socrates found the densest conceit and ignorance to exist in those who, because they knew a little, supposed they knew everything; or, being wise and capable of some things, had the vanity or ambition to be thought capable of many things which they were not. Better is the man who knows the extent of his own ignorance, and remains content with knowing that he does not know, than he who professes a wisdom of which he is ignorant, and attempts that of which he is incapable. And so Socrates says that the man who can tell the truth if he chooses, or who can speak falsely if he chooses, is better than the man who is incapable of speaking the truth, as not knowing truth from falsehood. Only the truth-speaking man can, if he will, be a liar. Or, the ability of a man to speak the truth measures his capacity for falsehood. The two things go together, so that no man can be mendacious, unless he be also veracious.

Aristotle indeed, points out that the epithets in their received meaning,—which is not Plato's—are applied not to the power itself, but to the habitual and intentional use of that power. So also Aristotle observes that Plato's conclusion—"He that does wrong wilfully is a better man than he that does wrong unwillingly," is falsely collected from induction or analogy. The analogy of the special arts and accomplishments, upon which the argument is built, is not applicable. Better has reference, not to the amount of intelligence, but to the dispositions and habitual intentions; though it presupposes a certain state and amount of intelligence as indispensable.

THOUGHTS, FROM A SICK SOLDIER.

Within the sphere of possibilities and controlling necessities, are all things created. Space, form, motion, duration, are the prime necessities controlling the possibilities. Without space and form, creation were creation unperceived, unperceivable. Creation were impossible without motion; the velocities of motion were impossible without duration, their measure; without the velocities of motion, the period of the germ, the time of reproduction, the era of development, were undetermined. In full perception of all possibilities and necessities did the Infinite establish his laws. The animal passions, are blind sensations, forming no part of the mind,—are products of the body; but I find not a particle of evidence that the mind is such. To admit it, would be admitting that organized matter weighs evidences, forms projects, and proceeds to execution. If not a product of the body, it should exist independent of it. Where, then, the necessity of its death with the body? Purpose, seeking perfection of development, is to me the law apparent, the manifested design of the Creator. Death of the soul is an exception to the law, which my reason rejects as an impossibility. The body presents an accomplished design,—not so the soul.

Faith and hope never accompany knowledge; if I possess the knowledge, I have no need of either. But they always accompany evidence. Without a reason, without evidence, their existence is purely fallacious. I may hope to visit Europe, but never to walk the Atlantic. I may have faith that I shall perform the journey within the year, but never within the hour.

The incompleteness of design, in case of the mind, is the evidence to my soul of continuance; and I believe that to every other, though not perceived as evidence, it is received as an impression, and becomes ingrained.

From this spring ever serene faith and hope; this constitutes the impregnable foundation of the soul's belief in eternal life. Against it the thunders of logic are all in vain. I can but look upon knowledge of eternal life, with the soul's present surroundings, as baneful—something akin to death revealed to the lower orders.

THE POSITIVISTS OF ENGLAND.

A correspondent of the Liberal Christian reports the following answer from Mr. Martineau to the question, "What progress are the Positivists in England making in the dissemination of their views?"

"Thus far," replied Mr. Martineau, "they have met with quite as much success as they could have expected, and perhaps even more. Their leaders are untiring and zealous men, and they have managed to influence thought indirectly, but to a very great extent, through many channels. They hold their weekly meetings, at which I believe there is always an attendance of men who do not yet call themselves Positivists, but who are certainly attracted towards that system. Lord Amberley, for instance, is one of these. The present 'pontiff' of the sect here is, I believe, Mr. Congreve, and among its 'high priests' are Mr. Frederick Harrison, Professor Huxley, Professor Beesley, etc. At present the Positivist leaders direct much attention towards the working classes, and their doctrines do find some acceptance among the working men. But they will be disowned by these as soon as they venture to fully explain to the working-man that, under the Positivist system, he is to be governed, and not to govern; and the present idol which he worships, Parliamentary government, is to be set aside for the reign of a priesthood, in the selection of which he is to have no choice."

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S HAREM.

The rooms of the women are very much alike, and furnished nearly alike. They are plain, but comfortable. The women live in them precisely as people do at a hotel. Each lady has her own key, and when she goes out she locks her door. There is little visiting back and forth, and the ladies behave very much as guests do at a first-class hotel. Every morning and evening, at the ringing of the bell, the inmates of the harem meet in the great parlor to attend prayers. They sing a hymn, and Young prays fervently. The prophet used to eat at the harem with his wives, but he seldom does so now. In the morning, on rising, each woman puts her room in order, and if she has children, dresses them for breakfast. After prayers they all go to breakfast, the ladies with children sitting at little family tables, and those without children at the common table. The same food is given to all, and the bill of fare is by no means a poor one. Brigham, from time to time, designates some of his wives to take charge of the cooking, and they remain on duty until relieved; during the day the women walk out, sew, sing, play the piano in the parlor, or walk with the children. Most of them spin, make cloth and color it. They are very proud of their cloth and embroidery. In the evening all hands go to the theatre, where every one of Brigham's wives has a reserved seat. It is said that Young liberally supplies his wives with money, and on fine days they drive out and go shopping. He employs a music teacher, French teacher and dancing master for the use of his household. Brigham's women are well dressed, but still they have to work hard, and he keeps up a wholesome discipline over them.—Letter to Cincinnati Gazette.

RATHER TOO SMART.—A merchant not far from the "Hub," recently hired a new clerk, and of course initiated him at once into the mystery of the "trade mark." The same afternoon, the newly inducted knight of the yard stick was showing some goods to a lady customer, when she demurred at the price of the articles. The feelings of the merchant may be imagined, when the young man called out at the top of his voice: "What shall I sell this for? It is marked four dollars and a half and cost fifty cents."

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

At the date when this paper will be issued, the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will have been held. But at the time of this writing we can only speak of it by anticipation. The Committee of Arrangements have labored earnestly, and they believe successfully, to secure an interesting and valuable meeting. They have thought it best to present more specific topics for the consideration of the Convention than in previous years, and to ask the speakers to confine themselves to the topics presented. The principles of the Association will admit of very definite application to the practical religious and social problems of the age. And people everywhere who are interested in the Association want to see this connection made. Therefore the Committee resolved to give one session of the Convention particularly to setting forth the principles and aims of the Association with a view to illustrate this point. They asked the President, Mr. Frothingham, to introduce the subject by a general statement covering the whole ground. Then they engaged Messrs. Wasson, Weiss, Abbot, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney to speak to such specific points as these:—The place and dominion of Religion among the Mental and Moral Powers; What Religion should be under the peculiar conditions of American Society; The spirit of the age as affecting the Future of Religious Organizations; Religion as a Force of Social Reform and Regeneration. All these topics follow legitimately from the "objects" of the Association as stated in its Constitution,—“to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit.”

Then there is one feature of the Association which the Committee thought it especially important to emphasize at this Annual Meeting,—the fact, namely, that it represents the idea of the fellowship of Religions; that it is not exclusively "Christian" nor confined to the limits of any specific religion, but grounds itself on the natural aspirations of man after truth and righteousness under whatever form of religion these aspirations may appear. They decided therefore to devote one session to this subject,—the Natural Sympathy of Religions and the Grounds on which they may come into practical unity and co-operation,—and engaged such speakers as Samuel Johnson, T. W. Higginson, Dr. Wise, and Wm. H. Channing, to present the striking points of this great theme. The subject includes, of course, the very practical problem, to be worked out in some way by the American people, of the Chinese and their Religion in this country. Can this problem be successfully solved on any other principles than those of the Free Religious Association?

The question of the Relation of Religion to the public schools is another of the vital practical problems in this country at this time. It has two branches,—the reading of the Bible in the schools as a religious exercise, and the use of the public money for Sectarian Schools. In this great question the members of the Free Religious Association must be especially interested, and upon it must have something pretty definite to say. The Committee, therefore, arranged to give one session of the Convention wholly to the consideration of this subject. They selected that noble veteran of the Anti-Slavery Reform, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, to present a paper on the question, introductory to a free discussion of it; and he, deeply interested in the subject, consented. But we are sorry to say that ill health compelled him to withdraw from the engagement. The Committee, fortunately, were able to secure Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the question, to take his place.

So we partially sketch the Annual Meeting in advance,—an a priori report. The report a posteriori may be looked for hereafter.

THE PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS.

The Progressive Friends have been summoned to their Eighteenth Yearly Meeting at Longwood, Pa. This meeting represents one of the most interesting of the free religious movements of the time. One finds there the fullest liberty mingled with the truest fellowship. The subjects considered are humanitarian rather than speculative; yet persons of every form of religious belief find a most hospitable welcome in the meeting. If a man is sincerely laboring in the service of truth and humanity, the members do not stop to ask whether he is orthodox or heterodox, Christian or non-Christian; he is counted as one with them and made to feel at home. We attended the meeting last year with great pleasure and profit. We wish we could go again this year. We shall never forget the large-hearted men and women we there met; the refreshing sincerity of the discussions; the plain but sunny and inviting meeting-house, with its crowd of home-looking people; the noon picnics—veritable seasons of communion they were—under the shade of the old trees around; and the open-doored old mansion half hidden by trees and vines, with its great motherly heart welcoming friends and strangers alike, where we found the shelter and affection of a true hospitality, and where in former days many a fugitive slave had received protection and comfort and aid on his perilous way to freedom. Here we took a new lesson in "pure and undefiled religion." "If thee sees anybody on the platform looking as if he had nowhere to go, take him into the wagon and bring him here,"—was the message with which the family carriage was daily dispatched to the railroad station. The whole scene—the meeting, the home, the beautiful country in the freshness of June, the hearty cheerful, working faith of the people—left a picture in the mind which can never be effaced. Long may Longwood Yearly Meeting continue to do its excellent work. No one can come into the mystic circle of its fellowship without feeling the spiritual bonds of faith, hope, and charity more strongly knit in his heart. We append the call for the meeting this year most gladly, only regretting that we cannot personally respond to it.

"THE PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS will hold their Eighteenth Yearly Meeting at Longwood (near Hamorton), Chester county, Pa., commencing on Fifth day (Thursday), the 2d of Sixth month (June), 1870, at 11 o'clock, A. M., and continuing three days.

All those who desire to share the fellowship of a Religious Society whose only bond of union is Love, and which imposes upon its members no theological test, but welcomes the co-operation of all who seek to illustrate their faith in God by devotion to Humanity, are cordially invited to attend this meeting. While every individual will be at liberty to express his opinions upon any of the questions that divide and agitate the religious world, the primary object of the gathering is not to discuss problems in theology, but to unite all, of whatever creed, in earnest, practical efforts to reform and reconstruct human society upon principles of Justice, Equality, and Fraternity; to stimulate those moral, social and spiritual influences which tend to purify and ennoble the human race; to rejoice in view of the enfranchisement of a people long oppressed and enslaved, and to adopt measures for removing from our Constitutions and laws the provisions which deny to women the full rights of citizenship; to bear a testimony against the national sins and social evils of the time; to cultivate the spirit of Universal Brotherhood, and to foster the aspirations and hopes by which Humanity rises above all that is earthly, grovelling, and evanescent, and takes hold of the Immortal Life.

Among those whose presence is expected to contribute to the interest of the meeting, we are permitted to mention the names of WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON and WILLIAM HENRY CHANNING.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1863 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1863 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOCK, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

He [Mr. Lincoln] said once that the best story he ever read in the papers of himself was this:—Two Quakeresses were travelling on the railroad, and were heard discussing the probable termination of the war. "I think," said the first, "that Jefferson will succeed." "Why does thee think so?" asked the other. "Because Jefferson is a praying man." "And so is Abraham a praying man," objected the second. "Yes; but the Lord will think Abraham is joking," the first replied, conclusively.—N. Y. Independent.

"That's a good gun of yours, stranger; but Uncle Dave here has one that beats it." "Ah! how far will it kill a hawk with No. 6 shot?" "I don't use shot or ball either," answered Uncle Dave for himself. "Then what do you use, Uncle Dave?" "I shoot salt altogether. I kill my game so far off with my gun that, without salt, the game would all spile before I could get it."

"Why should we celebrate Washington's birth-day more than mine?" asked a teacher. "Because he never told a lie!" shouted a little boy.

A ROMANIST AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

[Correspondence Boston Commonwealth.]

Dr H. S. Hewitt, an army surgeon, late of Gen. Grant's staff, delivered a lecture on Sunday evening week, in Carroll Hall, in this city, on "The Catholics of the Nineteenth Century." The performance was characterized by the spirit of unqualified assumption usual with speakers and writers in behalf of the church which claims to be infallible. The proposed sixteenth amendment came in for a first-rate notice. He said the woman's rights movement was the latest way in which the evil spirit of the age manifested itself. It was as dangerous to the public peace as was the abolition movement when it was first advocated. It had a tendency to pollute legislation, abolish religion, destroy the peace and harmony of thousands of homes, and even lead to suicide. (1) It was an absolutely anti-Christian movement. The Catholic church extended all the rights to women that God desired them to have. It protected the humblest of them all; it made them good wives and mothers. The church had raised one of their number to be the Queen of Heaven. The hall in which the foregoing sentiments were promulgated is an edifice erected by the Roman Catholics of Washington for general lecture purposes, and named, I believe, in memory of that eminent Maryland Catholic, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, who survived latest of all the signers of the Declaration of Independence. It is a coincidence worth mentioning here, that in this same hall was held the National Woman's Suffrage Convention, a year ago last winter. From the same rostrum on which Dr. Hewitt spoke were delivered the speeches of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Parker Pillsbury and Lucretia Mott. Dickens also gave his readings there. So that however hostile the Catholics are towards progressive ideas, they are nevertheless willing, for hire, to furnish a fine audience-room for their public advocacy.

It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

Beautiful Women!

All women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty? Women know, too, that when men speak of the intellect of women, they speak critically, tamely, coolly; but when they come to speak of the charms of a beautiful woman, their language and their eyes kindle with an enthusiasm which shows them to be profoundly, if not, indeed, ridiculously in earnest. It is part of the natural sagacity of women to perceive all this, and therefore employ every allowable art to become the goddess of that adoration. Preach to the contrary, as we may, against the arts employed by women for enhancing their beauty, there still stands the eternal fact, that the world does not prefer the society of an ugly woman of genius to that of a beauty of less intellectual acquirements. The world has yet allowed no higher mission to woman than to be beautiful, and it would seem that the ladies of the present age are carrying this idea of the world to greater extremes than ever, for all women now to whom nature has denied the talismanic power of beauty, supply the deficiency by the use of a most delightful toilet article, known as the "Bloom of Youth," which has been lately introduced into this country by GEORGE W. LAIRD, a delicate beautifier, which smooths out all indentations, furrows, scars; removing tan, freckles, and discolorations from the skin, leaving the complexion clear, brilliant, and beautiful, the skin soft and smooth. With the assistance of this new American trick of a Lady's toilet, female beauty is destined to play a larger part in the admiration of men and the ambition of women than all the arts employed since her creation. Prof. C. F. Chandler, Chemist to the Metropolitan Board of Health, has recently prepared a chemical analysis of this delightful toilet preparation, and reported that the "Bloom of Youth" was harmless, containing nothing injurious to the health. Ladies need have no fear of using this invaluable toilet acquisition.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

THE TONGUE.

[Read to the Unitarian Society, Dover, N. H., Nov. 17, 1867.]

"A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

PROVERBS 25: 11.

The power of the tongue—who shall measure it? More even than the hand, the tongue is the exponent of character. "Actions speak louder than words," they say; but oftentimes words are actions. King Theodore, of Abyssinia, gives the order,—and two thousand of his troops, suspected of intending to desert, are set upon by their comrades, and heaped upon the ground with ghastly gashes across their throats. What deed could speak louder than that word? Murder leaped full-grown from Theodore's tongue. When the Greeks had repulsed the Persians, and the allied fleet lay unsuspecting in the harbors of Athens, Themistocles came into the public assembly, and told the Athenians that he had a plan which would ensure them the supremacy over all Greece, but which he would only disclose at first to a man appointed by themselves. They appointed Aristides. To him Themistocles told his plan, namely, to burn the ships of the allies by night, and thus secure to Athens the undisputed empire of the sea. Aristides came back to the assembly, and said:—"The plan of Themistocles is greatly to your advantage; but it is unjust." Without hearing the plan, the Athenians voted to reject it. That speech was an action, and saved the honor of a great people.

Character can proclaim itself as unmistakably through the mouth as through the arm. The tongue tells more than it means. Did not Theodore and Aristides lay bare their very souls by what they said? A very few years ago, I talked with an Episcopal clergyman lately from the West, and asked him if he had ever been in the army. "Not I!" he exclaimed, "I might have gone as chaplain, but I had no notion of being outranked by the military!" What an unconscious self-betrayal of a coarse, selfish heart was this! Not a thought of the good he might have done in tending the wounded, nursing the sick, helping the weary, or doing the thousand-and-one little acts of service which a faithful chaplain could so easily do,—not a throb of sympathy for the cause of freedom and union,—not a regret that the greatest moral conflict that ever fought itself out on the field of blood should be unshared by him,—no, nothing of this! But only a vulgar stickling for precedence, a mean jealousy of rank, a pompous, heartless, contemptible assertion of the privilege of his order and the dignity of his church! If that man had known how utterly he had unmasked his character, and how thoroughly disgusted I turned away from the sight of it, I believe that even he would have blushed for his word. There is a proverb—"Scratch the skin of a Russian, and you will find a Tartar." But our respectable clergyman had scratched his own skin,—and I saw the priest of the parable, "going by on the other side."

Ah friends! if we only knew how our most trivial remarks often reveal most plainly our inward state,—raise the windows of our souls, as it were, and let in the gaze of the world,—should we not all be on our guard? And yet "being on our guard" would be no protection. Those words of ours speak loudest whose full meaning we ourselves least understand; in fact, it is precisely because we are unconscious of their meaning, that they mean so much. There is no safety but in being what we ought to be, inwardly as outwardly. It is in chance sayings chiefly,—sayings that are unsuspected by the speakers of having any significance,—that I see best the characters about me. The clergyman I spoke of frankly exposed his own vulgarity and selfishness, just because it did not occur to him that I should think it such. He did not think it such himself, and why should I? Hence he could not have been on his guard, except by being me as well as himself. Doubtless my own careless words are as significant to others as his were to me; I can only hope they signify something better. But the law I would emphasize is this,—that our words, especially when we speak most spontaneously, lay bare our inmost hearts. The tongue reveals the soul, because it is the soul's outlet. The good and the bad within us, equally and quite beyond our own knowledge, continually shine through our speech; and there is no helping it. The tongue is a tell-tale,—unconsciously and unwillingly, it may be, but nevertheless a tell-tale. Let the tale it must tell, then, be a sweet and ennobling one!

But the power of the tongue by no means stops here,—by no means ends with self-revelation. It is a most potent agent, this little tongue in our mouths. It may raise a hurricane, or calm one; it may bless a heart, or break it; it may be an angel, or a devil. In the mouth of Peter the Hermit, it sets on fire the heart of nations, and hurls all Europe in a mass against the Moslem. In the mouth of Napoleon the Third, it keeps vast empires on tip-toe to catch its most trivial accent, and holds a continent in the bondage of fear. In the mouth of Garrison, it electrifies the conscience of a great people, and emancipates a continent from the bondage of a great sin. In the mouth of Jesus, it comforts a broken-hearted woman; in the mouth of Judas, it betrays the comforter, and quenches in blood the starriest life in the memory of man.

But we need not look so high nor go so far to find proofs of the power of the tongue. How much of the happiness of your life and mine has it made or marred! How mightily have the words of others stirred our souls for good or ill, for pleasure or for pain! How tremendously have our own words reacted upon us, establishing or undermining our self-respect, filling us with self-reproach or soothing us with the sweet remembrance of duty done! Who can estimate the debt we owe to those who by a "word fitly spoken" have quickened our better life, revived our drooping energies, rallied our failing courage, touched our diviner impulses, calmed our anxious fears, fed our hungry hearts? The words of a noble spirit shine in our memories like the constellations of the night, always there to cheer us by their true, pure radiance. And, alas! how like the sulphurous fumes from the fabled bottomless pit rise up at times the recollections of words not "fitly spoken," suffocating our better thoughts, stifling our purer feelings, choking our holier purposes! When our souls are at peace, lying like blue lakes of limpid waters,—so still and peaceful that the most delicate clouds of heaven find in them a perfect mirror for their beauty,—how often has the memory of some evil word, long ago spoken to us, swept over them like a fierce squall from the mountains, wrinkled their smooth surface into black and angry waves, and stirred up from the bottom the mud of our lower nature, until every reflection of the heavens perishes from the turbid floods! Lament it we may, deny it we cannot, that the subtle poison of another's tongue has again and again left in our hearts wounds that time seems powerless to cure. Worse than the fangs of a rattlesnake is a cruel, a lying, an unclean tongue. And knowing this, I could imagine no more dreadful vengeance on the wickedest of men, than a full consciousness how cruel, lying, unclean, his tongue had been, and how terribly envenomed a sting it had left in innocent hearts. The words that we have uttered,—are they not a large part of our life? Frightful is the thought that our own tongue may have been the snake that stung our brother into agony, or, worse than agony, into sin. The Greek poet speaks of "winged words." Let loose from their cage, who shall tell whither they fly? Some of them descend like a hawk upon a dove-cot, rending and tearing with talons and beak; others settle down like filthy Harpies or birds of carrion, defiling all they touch; others, like nightingales, enter into the shadows of the grove, and make the midnight vocal with divinest melody; while others, winged with love and gentleness, courage, purity, and truth, are less like birds of earth than of heaven, and with their snowy pinions bear the thoughts of men up to the purest atmosphere of worship. Well for us, if we have spoken only words like these! Better still, if we suffer none but words like these to issue henceforth from the portals of our lips!

We are far too reckless of our tongues. With what lightning speed an ill tale of our neighbor flies from mouth to mouth! The evil thing never grows lean in its flight; but the farther it goes, the fatter it grows. From a fact small as the egg of a humming-bird, there seems to be hatched out at last, nobody knows how, a slander big as an ostrich. It takes weeks for good news to travel into the next street; but bad news is all over town before night-fall. Of all the vices to which the tongue is subject, perhaps the worst of all is gossip; for this seems to be a complication of them all. It is a mixture of malice, idleness, untruthfulness, envy, vanity, and frivolity, in varying proportions. I never could see why it is, that a bad story about our neighbor always gets more widely believed than a good one. The public treats a man's reputation, once suspected, as the termites, or white ants of Africa, treat the body of a sick or wounded buffalo; each one takes his bite, and in a few hours nothing is left but a heap of bones. In a multitude of tongues there is sure destruction. All this is pitifully wrong. It ought to be a pain to every soul, and it is a pain to every noble soul, to hear ill of any one,—much more to be obliged to speak ill of him. A true lady or true gentleman (using those words in their best sense), is scrupulous to the last degree to abstain from back-biting in every form. The temptation to indulge in gossip is strong in proportion to the emptiness of our heads, and the coldness of our hearts. Increase the stock of ideas, or the warmth of noble sentiments, and gossip becomes at once the most insipid and the meanest of all occupations. The best preventive of gossip is the cultivation of a large, generous, just, and charitable spirit,—the spirit which delights in all good things and thoughts and takes no pleasure in that which belittles itself or belies a neighbor. We may talk of small things in a large way. I would by no means padlock the lips on any subject, great or small; but I would, if possible, avoid descending to the dimensions of the tiny. It is quite possible to use the microscope without becoming an animalcule. Keep a large spirit,—and careless chat will never dwindle into gossip.

The power of the tongue nowhere seems so vast as in the home; it has more to do with domestic happiness than wealth or penury, sickness or health. "A word fitly spoken,"—how beautiful it is at home! The "soft answer that turneth away wrath"—where shall we listen for it, if not at home? Among brothers and sisters, no harsh word should ever come. A few families I have known, where quarrels and bickerings were like snow in the tropics,—read of, but never seen. "Oh," says some one, "all children fight,—it won't hurt them. They will outgrow that." Ah friends, that is a most sad mistake—it does hurt them. These frequent outbursts of passion, these explosions of petulance and impatience and selfishness, leave scars that are never outgrown. They prevent that full and perfect communion which must begin in earliest childhood, if it all. Doubtless love often continues ardent and strong, although home-life is jarred by frequent brawls; but that nameless beauty which I have learned to recognize is never there. Two sisters I know who in two bodies appear to have but one soul; so perfect is the accord, so instantaneous the self-sacrifice of each for the other, so uniformly gentle their words and tones. Never once have I heard between them a word that was not "fitly spoken," or detected that subtle something in look or tone or manner which betrays that words not "fitly spoken" are sometimes uttered, though out of your hearing. In such spiritual unity as this, there can be no sham; it is the simple, transparent fact. But a relationship so perfect could never be formed after a childhood spent in frequent or even occasional quarrels; its exquisite grace and beauty spring only out of a life-long harmony.

I never perform the marriage service without a half-sad query in my heart. How long will these young lives be blessed by words always "fitly spoken?" Conjugal happiness is so enduring that the wildest hurricane from without cannot shake it,—and yet so frail that a single breath from within may shatter it. What misery often follows from careless words! What fatal alienation often grows from conversation only a little heedless! First a cloud no bigger than a man's hand, then a leaden pall overspreading the entire skies. Not only can moroseness, and caprice, and selfishness, ruin the peace of home; but simple sarcasm, at first wholly in jest, then half in earnest, at last wholly in earnest, has often done it. Why is it that third parties feel so very uncomfortable when husband and wife begin to utter pleasantries, not with each other, but at each other? Because we all feel that, however safe it may seem, they are walking on thin ice. It is dangerous. Very often no harm at all ensues. But oftener the danger ends in disaster. The peril is very great. If either succeeds in turning the laugh against the other, there is pretty sure to be one aching heart, however disguised by smiles; it is very hard to be held up to ridicule by one we love. Besides, the habit develops anything but sympathy and affection; it puts asunder, but never unites. Nowhere is uniform and delicate courtesy more charming than between husband and wife; never are words more fitly spoken, than cheerful, yet kind and respectful, words between them. In the home, at least, let every word be attuned to deep harmony,—adapted always to give pleasure, and never pain. Let children learn to appreciate the value of kind tones, and pleasant words and gentle looks. So shall home be, in very truth, a heaven.

A JAPANESE PROTEST AGAINST CHRISTIANITY.—The Independence Belye says that the following protest is being circulated extensively in Japan. It purports to be signed by a number of Bonzes, or Buddhist bishops:—

The perverse religion of Jesus, the teacher from Heaven, is a calamity which menaces the empire. It is useless to repeat it once again, and for a long time there have been everywhere protests borne against it. In spite of that, the fools who submit themselves to this doctrine are found in no small numbers among the populace. Furthermore, the men of foreign countries seek in every way to propagate it, and is difficult to say that they will not resort to violence and force of arms.

We have learned that the Mikado is full of anxiety on this subject. We are profoundly afflicted about it, and with the desire of bringing to bear a perpetual prohibition against this doctrine, we, most unworthy as we are, who have already with Buddhism made the strength of Japan, are determined to live and die with the empire; and despite our uselessness, are resolved to serve it even at the cost of our lives. For this reason we beg and request upon our knees that this protest may be published and posted everywhere.—Zion's Herald.

THE POPE DECLARES HIMSELF INFALLIBLE.—The French minister in Rome, De Banneville, in his report to Count Daru of an interview with Pius IX, quotes the Pope as saying: "Daru does not like the dogma of infallibility. That is a pity. But the Holy Ghost will not halt for fear of disturbing Daru's scruples. Tell him, my son, that neither ye nor any other person will prevent me from being infallible. I am, I feel myself to be infallible, and who can know it better than I?"

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE OF PEACE AND LIBERTY.

[The following circular was issued from Geneva, November 1st. 1899. We are indebted to Rev. M. D. Conway, for a copy.]

The Congress which was held at Lausanne in the month of September last was not only an imposing public manifestation,* but it proved likewise in a striking manner that the International League of Peace and Liberty has already struck deep root in the soil of Europe, and that the principles by which it is directed are adopted by the most eminent representatives of European democracy.

After having been proclaimed in their generality by the Congress of Geneva, which has summed them up in these two words, henceforth inseparably united, Peace and Liberty (si vis pacem, para libertatem) and which has given as an object to the League which has proceeded from its bosom, the formation of a federal republic of the peoples of Europe, under the title of the "United States of Europe," these principles had been followed out by the Congress of Berne in some of their chief corollaries; the application of the federative republican system to the constitution of the different states and to their mutual relations, the transformation of armies into national militia, the separation of the Church from the State, the acknowledgment of the rights of women, the solution of social questions by the development of the principle of property based on individual or co-operative labour, by the diffusion of instruction and education, by the liberty of association, in a word, by all proper means which may tend to establish an equality still greater among citizens. See the circulars of the Central Committee of the 14th. May and 11th. July last. They have just received from the Congress of Lausanne a new consecration and new developments, which in attesting their vitality continue to prepare a future existence to which the people of Europe are progressing. We place under your view further on, the resolutions voted by the latter Congress, but we do not intend to impose them literally on all members of the League, any more than those of preceeding Congresses, as a charter not to be discussed or perfected. It is sufficient for us that our adherents adopt their spirit, and are willing to forward with us that which is the real object of our League, Peace and Liberty by the formation of a republican federation of the peoples of Europe.

With regard to the rest, we admit the differences of opinion which are inevitable on such a subject, and we even think them useful for elucidating questions, and for the discovery of genuine solutions.

It remains now for all those who are disposed to make progress with us on this road, to aid us in propagating our principles, and to spread them amongst the masses who decide eventually the destinies of the people.

But in order that this propaganda should radiate on the widest scale, it is necessary that it should not be limited to an individual or isolated action, it is necessary that Local Committees, should everywhere be formed, to act, each of them, by certain means, and corresponding with the Central Committee of the League, either directly or by the medium of a National Committee, combining all the Local Committees of the same Country.

This organization of the Local Committees, in connection with National Committees in correspondence with the Central Committee, would have the further advantage of forming, as it were, the rudiment of what is to be some day the "United States of Europe," and by the same means to prepare the accomplishment of that event. How much it is to be wished that our League, by the organization of its Committees and of its assemblies, may offer an image of the European Constitution which it aspires to found!

There are still, unfortunately, states where legislation does not permit any collective action of this kind; and where our League can only reckon on single adherents, these persons will be able in any case to place themselves in communication with the Central Committee.

Let Local Committees, National Committees, or single adherents, all send subsidies to the Central Committee, in order that the latter may resume their late journal, the United States of Europe; or at least publish regularly a bulletin printed or autographed in two, three, or four languages, and containing, besides the communications relative to the League, special articles which the democratic journals of Europe to which they would be sent may reproduce. Whatever the mode may be which the means in our possession may permit us to adopt, thanks to the co-operation of the friends of our cause, it will not be long wanting. Let us work then, dear fellow-citizens of Europe, labor to collect around you adherents and subscriptions, and to form, however little you may be able, a Local Committee in your neighborhood. If it is necessary that the patriots of each nation co-operate in the establishment of democracy in their own country, it is necessary likewise that they should sustain the "International League of Peace and Liberty," as all democracies are conjointly responsible, and our League alone can remove those obstacles which national prejudices—too often sustained by democrats themselves—still oppose to the fraternity of the people. It is in the present day, as Jacobi said in his letter to the Congress of Lausanne, "the natural centre of all European democracy."

Greeting and fraternity,

The Committee,

JULES BARNI, President.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONGRESS OF LAUSANNE.

1st. Question.—To determine the bases of a federal organization of Europe. That whereas the fundamental and constant cause of war which is perpetuated in Europe in the absence of all international judicial institutions, that the first condition—in order that an international tribunal may supply, by judicial decisions, the solutions which war and diplomacy vainly seek from force and cunning—is that this tribunal may be freely and directly chosen and instituted by the will of the people; and that it may have, as a rule for its decisions, international laws freely voted by the same people.

That whereas, whatever may be the moral authority of a tribunal, the execution of its decisions in order to be effective, must be sanctioned by a coercive force;

That whereas, such a force can only exist legitimately in so far as it is constituted, regulated, and carried on by the direct will of the people;

That whereas, the combination of these three institutions; an international law, a tribunal to apply this law, and a power which may insure the execution of the decisions of this tribunal, constitute a government;

The Congress declares:

1. That the only means of establishing peace in Europe, is the formation of a federation of peoples under the name of "The United States of Europe."

2. That the government of this union must be republican and federative; that is to say, to repose on the principle of the sovereignty of the people, and respect the autonomy and independence of each of the members of the federation.

3. That the constitution of this government must be perfect.

4. That the European federation must guarantee to each of the people who compose it, sovereignty and autonomy, individual liberty, rights of suffrage, liberty of the press, liberty of meeting and forming societies, rights of conscience, rights of labor without any interference, the effective and individual responsibility of all the functionaries of the executive order, the nomination of magistrates by universal suffrage.

5. That no people can enter into the confederation if it has not already the full exercise of universal suffrage, of the right of consenting to or refusing a tax, of the right of peace and war, of the right of concluding or ratifying political alliances and treaties of commerce, and the right of improving itself and its constitution.

2nd Question.—What solutions ought the different questions concerned and contained in the general title of the Eastern question, including the Polish question, to receive, according to the principles of the League?

The Congress declares:

That the Polish question, the Eastern question, and the question of the Slavonian people, ought to be resolved by the application of the widest nature of the general principle of the autonomy of the people.

In consequence, and after having acknowledged the necessity of a profound study of the various and complicated interests involved in these questions, it decides that a special commission, composed of five members, is to collect all the documents relative to these questions; and it requests the Central Committee to name the president and members of the commission.

3rd Question.—What are the means to remove all economical and social antagonisms amongst the citizens?

The Congress has understood, after the divergence of opinions and of systems which were emitted during the discussions of two sittings, that this question has not been sufficiently studied, and they decided that a commission should be charged to present new resolutions to the next Congress; and confined themselves to adopt the following political basis:—

The Congress again declares that the social question is inseparable from the political question—the one not being able to be resolved without the other; and that it is the duty of the society to attend immediately to the amelioration of the general conditions of labor and of exchange, with a view of providing a remedy for the numberless abuses which affect society at present; without, however, doing any prejudice to the liberty of the individual. The following political conditions are indispensable, in order that any economical reform should be efficacious:—1st. The federal republican government. 2nd. The laws voted directly by the people. 3rd. Lay instruction, obligatory and gratuitous, for the educational department, and gratuitous in all its degrees for the two sexes. 4th. Abolition of standing armies, to be replaced by the militia. 5th. Abolition of punishment by death under all its forms. 6th. Abolition of all indirect taxes, to be replaced by a direct and progressive tax. 7th. Election of magistrates by universal suffrage.

REGULATIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONGRESS.

1. The League shall be composed of individual members of sections and adherent associations; and the representation in the Central Committee shall be in the ratio of the number of the members of these sections or associations.

2. Every individual member, or member of a section, will have to pay an annual subscription of one franc fifty centimes, in consideration of which he will receive every year a statement of the preceding Congress. In consideration of a yearly subscription of six francs each individual member, or member of a section, will receive a full report of the debates of the Congress.

The adherent associations will agree with the Central Committee with regard to the subscriptions, in consideration of which each member will receive a full report. Besides the subscriptions, the League will always receive voluntary gifts with gratitude.

3. The Central Committee is composed of twelve members, who must be domiciled in Switzerland. Of those twelve members eight are chosen for a year by the Congress; and to those are united four others, whom they choose by preference amongst the nationalities that are not sufficiently represented by the members elected.

The Committee thus composed has the right of filling up the places of the members who leave office in the course of the year. Lastly, they name an unlimited number of correspondents, either spontaneously, or on the proposition of the sections. The members which the Committee takes as correspondents may vote with the Committee when they assist at its sittings.

4. The members of the Central Committee name their bureau, with the exception of the president, who is chosen by the Congress. All the functions are honorary, except that of the secretary and treasurer, which may be united in the same person.

5. Every adherent has the right to vote in the Congress, and may represent besides, by one vote, an association or section of adherents; one adherent cannot represent more than one association or section.

6. No one will be admitted to take part in the deliberations of the Congress but on the presentation of a personal card, delivered on the basis of the programme either by the Local Committees or by the Central Committee.

N. B.—The Central Committee has still a certain number of copies of the annals of the Congress of Geneva, which they will send on request at the price of three francs and fifty centimes.

THE REPLY OF GENERAL GARIBALDI TO THE CIRCULAR OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE LEAGUE OF PEACE AND LIBERTY.

MY DEAR STEFANI,—The conception of your work is so great a step in the path of progress, that it does honor to those minds which have imagined it, and which carry it forward with so much spirit. The International League of Peace and Liberty, and the United States of Europe, combine the aspirations of the suffering people in pursuit of the realization of the beau-ideal—Humanity. With regard to myself, convinced as I am of the grandeur of your idea, I declare myself once again a soldier in your ranks, and I solicit the co-operation of all those friends whom I have the happiness of possessing in the world.

GUISEPPE GARIBALDI.

CAPRERA, 16th November, 1869.

* There were present 658 adherents and 1,010 visitors of different nationalities.

The Rev. Mr. Thom, minister of the parish of Govan, had just risen up in the pulpit to lead the congregation in prayer, when a gentleman in front of the gallery took out his handkerchief to wipe the dust from his brow; forgetting that a pack of cards was wrapped up in it, the whole pack was scattered over the breast of the gallery. Mr. Thom could not resist a sarcasm, solemn as the act was in which he was about to engage. "Oh, man, man! surely your psalm-book has been awfu' ill bound."

MY TRIUMPH.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

The autumn-time has come;
On the woods that dream of bloom,
And over purpling vines,
The low sun fainter shines.

The aster-flower is failing,
The hazel's gold is paling;
Yet overhead more near
The eternal stars appear.

And present gratitude
Insures the future's good,
And for the things I see
I trust the things to be;

That in the paths untrod,
And the long days of God,
My feet shall still be led,
My heart be comforted.

O living friends who love me!
O dear ones gone above me!
Careless of other fame,
I leave to you my name.

Hide it from idle praises,
Save it from evil phrases;
Why, when dear lips that spake it
Are dumb, should strangers wake it?

Let the thick curtain fall;
I better know than all
How little I have gained,
How vast the unattained.

Not by the page word-painted
Let life be banned or sainted;
Deeper than written scroll
The colors of the soul.

Sweeter than any sung,
My songs that found no tongue;
Nobler than any fact
My wish that failed of act.

Others shall sing the song,
Others shall right the wrong—
Finish what I begin,
And all I fail of win.

What matter—I, or they?
Mine or another's day,
So the right word be said
And life the sweeter made?

Hail to the coming singers!
Hail to the brave light-bringers!
Forward I reach, and share
All that they sing and dare.

The airs of heaven blow o'er me;
A glory shines before me
Of what mankind shall be—
Pure, generous, brave and free.

A dream of man and woman
Diviner, but still human,
Solving the riddle old,
Shaping the Age of Gold!

The love of God and neighbor;
And equal-handed labor;
The richer life, where beauty
Walks hand in hand with duty.

Ring, bells in unreared steeples,
The joy of unborn peoples!
Sound, trumpets far off blown,
Your triumph is my own!

Parcel and part of all,
I keep the festival,
Forereach the good to be,
And share the victory.

I feel the earth move sunward,
I join the great march onward,
And take, by faith, while living,
My freehold of thanksgiving.

THE PRIVILEGES OF A STOCKHOLDER.

The privileges of stockholders are illustrated by a paragraph clipped from a Paris letter. Two gentlemen were chatting on the Boulevard, one was a great speculator, developing the plan of a magnificent project, the other a dazzled capitalist, ready to snap at the bait. He hesitated a little, but was just yielding, when near these two passed a couple of youngsters of twelve years. They were looking into a tobacco shop close by, and one cried out to the other:—

"I'd like to smoke a sou's worth of tobacco."
"Well," said the other, "buy a sou's worth."
"Ah! as luck will have it, I haven't the sou."
"Hold on! I've got two sous."
"That's the ticket! just the thing; one for the pipe and one for the tobacco."

"Oh, yes, but what am I to do?"
"You? Oh! you shall be stockholder, you can spit."

It was a flash of light. The capitalist thrust his hands into his pockets and fled.

In a recent trial in California, where Chinese evidence was admissible, the prosecuting attorney, having some doubts as to the correctness of the testimony, inquired of the interpreter whether a Chinaman under the usual oath would tell the truth. "Oh! no," responded John; "Chinaman lie, alle same as you; alle same as you; alle same any Melican lie!"

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Hope the demand for the first two or three numbers out of print will be so great as to be an inducement for you to reprint a supply. For one, I would give five times the cost for them."

—"I am a seeker after Truth in sympathy with Free Religion. After a long Orthodox experience, ending with its highest phase, the Swedenborgian, I think I see 'regions beyond'. I want the benefits of your paper, and the privilege of saying I have watched you closely, admired your course, and hope for your 'final perseverance' and success."

—"I am a minister of the Gospel, belonging, I may say, to the Congregational Church; and having heard of your frank rejection of the Christian Religion as being especially of Divine origin, and of the honest and able manner in which you sustain your views, as well as of your earnest efforts to promote the highest good of the race, I am desirous of reading THE INDEX, edited, I believe, by yourself, and published at Toledo."

—"I am delighted with the paper, and you may count me among its most devoted friends. I think your discourse upon the 'Practical Work of Free Religion' is the best statement of a true religious life I have yet seen; and the grandest and noblest scheme for human development ever yet proposed. I believe we can build safely upon your foundation, because it has its basis in human nature itself, and not in anything external. I offer myself as an humble co-worker with you in so grand an enterprise."

—"You will find enclosed two dollars for THE INDEX. We have kept up a free religious society in this place for eight years. We have had no regular speaker, have selected five or six of the best readers, and have read what we called the most radical sermons. Commenced on Beecher, then Parker, Collyer, Freeman Clarke, Frothingham; some of us think we can stand some of your sermons. Our society numbers about thirty members. I enclose a copy of the organization; you will see that we have got beyond a creed. I never have seen THE INDEX, but think it is just what we want. I think that all liberal minds are coming on to your ground, outside of any Christian organization."

—"When in College at Brunswick, I had the pleasure of meeting you and appreciating several of your discourses. I have often said that you hit the religious side of me more squarely than any other person I ever heard speak in that line. A copy of your INDEX has been placed in my hands by a friend; I have loaned it till it is all worn out. I like it, and wish it a long life and a vigorous one, too. I wish you God-speed in your worthy endeavor to break religious bread to the starving ones,—naturally pure bread, which savors not even of so many as one of the thirty-nine articles. I write to request you to send me one or two specimen numbers of THE INDEX. If I can have them to show, I believe I can get three or four subscribers whose names I will forward with my own in due time."

—"Before I came here, I had an opportunity to read all the numbers of THE INDEX, including the one containing the article on Mr. Lincoln. I send you all the money I have. [Returned.] Please send the paper while the money lasts; I think it will be all I shall be able to read. I am sinking rapidly under consumption. I have long believed in one perfect Being, the Force, the Spirit of the universe, on whom I rely with the utmost confidence, and look forward to my last day as my day of jubilee. I do not murmur at this wearisome dissolution; I know it is in accord with his laws. I have but one affliction. Laymen and ministers force nostrums on my soul, which is not sick, but they do not offer the poor body even an orange or a glass of jelly,—nay, not even the traditional cup of water. I wish I could see you in the body, but I shall know your spirit."

VI. THE COMPANIONS OF CADMUS, AND THE SERPENT.

Lo, where the cave its rocky throat distends,
 And to the scene mysterious horror lends,
 A serpent vast, with shining crest of gold,
 Coils his huge length in many a scaly fold.
 His lustrous eye burns bright with glittering fire;
 His forked tongue darts forth its venom'd ire;
 His jaws are armed with fangs in triple rows;
 His swelling body large and larger grows.
 With fatal step the Tyrians reach the grove,
 And through its glades all unsuspecting rove,
 And, seeking eagerly the crystal spring,
 Plunge in the urns with loudly-echoing ring.
 From the recesses of his cavern dread,
 The startled monster thrusts his hideous head,
 And with fierce hiss assails the affrighted band.
 Each drops the vessel from his nerveless hand;
 Pale, shuddering, dumb, their trembling limbs attest
 The fear which fills each horror-smitten breast.
 Exulting o'er his prey, their frightful foe
 Writhes his vast folds, and meditates the blow.
 In lofty arch his tortuous length he rears,
 And high o'er all the verdant grove appears;
 Helpless before his fascinating gaze,
 His glittering eye the trembling crew surveys.
 Not mightier he who, high in upper air,
 Divides the Greater from the Lesser Bear.

DESTRUCTION AND CONSTRUCTION.

Towards the end of March, we received the following letter from a professor of high reputation in one of the first universities in the country. Its concluding sentence has been often in our mind, and long before this we intended to say a few words in comment. But better late than never:—

"Your number eleven has never come to hand. I have hoped that it was only snowed up, and would melt its way through; but, as your number twelve has just arrived, I must presume that the former one is lost. Please send me another, as I mean to keep a file of all your numbers, and leave it to my favorite child when I am obliged to part from it.

But a word in your good-tempered ear—an ounce of construction is worth tons of destruction."

This closing paragraph, we think, utters the secret misgivings, not only of those who look upon the liberal tendencies of the times with fear and abhorrence, but also of many who, as in this case, sympathize with them fully, yet feel, perhaps, a little distrust of their iconoclastic influence. We owe it to such as these, among whom we have found many of our best and truest friends, to state frankly our convictions on the subject of "destruction and construction."

The great purpose of THE INDEX—the purpose which gave it birth and continues to give it life—is to show how, out of decaying Christianity, a deeper and broader and higher faith is developing slowly in the heart of Christendom, and to do what it can in the way of fostering this better faith. Its work is therefore both destructive and constructive—destructive so far as it would hasten the decay of the old, constructive so far as it would promote the growth of the new. Let us inquire, then, what Christianity has constructed, what Free Religion will construct, and which of the two constructions will best subserve the future welfare of mankind. If the later of the two faiths shall promise more than the earlier, then let us dismiss all fear, and labor with redoubled courage, earnestness, and hope.

Christianity can point to three great positive constructions,—the Christian Character, the Christian Theology, and the Christian Church. Its claim to insure "salvation" in another world we leave out of our account, concerning ourselves solely with what it has accomplished in this world.

The Christian Character is in many respects exceedingly beautiful, and we will yield to no one in admiration for its real beauty. Its best and grandest elements, however, are not Christian, but human,—due to humanity itself, not to Christianity. What is peculiar to it are the so-called Christian virtues; and these all grow out of the great, distinguishing peculiarity of Christianity, namely, FAITH IN CHRIST. "Love to Jesus" is the great inspiration, the chief constituent of the Christian character as such; and about it cluster the humility, the tenderness, the resignation, the docility, the self-abnegation, the submissiveness, the entire prostration of the soul before its Lord and Savior, which in all ages have been the spiritual graces that have caused the canonization of the saints of Christian history.

The Christian Theology is the result of human intellect as consecrated to the construction of a great system of belief, based on the idea that Jesus is the Christ, the King of Humanity and the Incarnate God. Beginning in the simple claim of Jesus to the Hebrew Messiahship, it gradually grew into the stately structure of the Catholic Faith, because human thought, concentrated on the embryonic claim of Jesus as exhibited in the gospels, could not help drawing out of it all its logical corollaries and implications. The bare, undeveloped claim of Jesus to be the Messiah was the acorn,—the great system of Orthodoxy is the oak.

The Christian Church is the result of the Christian Character and the Christian Theology, working themselves out in the social life of man. It is a vast institution whose origin, law, and object are the same, namely, faith in Christ. It exists to give scope for action to this faith, and to bring all the world under its influence. All its activities are directed by this one idea, branching out in countless directions and in diverse forms.

That these three great constructions have accomplished, and are still accomplishing, great good to man, we certainly believe; and so long as they continue to accomplish good, they will last. But, being adapted to an infantile condition of the human soul (the chief aim being avowedly to make men "become as little children"), they grow less and less adapted to the present actual needs of society. What, then, will Free Religion put in their place?

Aiming at the complete development of man in all his possibilities, it will create a character whose ideal shall be that of manhood and womanhood, not childhood. Its great virtues will be moral strength, freedom, courage, independence, self-reliance, indomitable will directed by intelligence, incapability of self-surrender to merely personal influence. These are perfectly consistent with the virtues of gentleness, tenderness, modesty, and so forth, but inconsistent with that "faith in Christ" which Christianity demands.

Instead of aiming at the building up a system of definite beliefs, Free Religion plants principles in the mind, which alone can lead to truth. Confiding in reason, in thought, in science, in natural law, in natural growth, it does not seek to propagate special opinions, but to make the human mind so free from fear and prejudice and superstition, that its faculties may work untrammelled by the assumed necessity of defending any opinions. It seeks to create the LOVE OF TRUTH, rather than to spread abroad any PARTICULAR TRUTHS. Many of our radical friends are disturbed, even alarmed, because we are striving to give men an idea of religion which shall not bind them to ANY FORGONE CONCLUSIONS, EVEN CONCERNING GOD AND IMMORTALITY. They do not see that the heart of this age is deeply agitated by doubts on these points, and that the only possible solution of them must come, if it come at all, by looking the facts bravely in the face. Affirmation and re-affirmation echo on every side; but radical dogmatism is as powerless as orthodox dogmatism to solve these doubts. The questions are real, and must be heard. In this impency of the Christian religion, and its youngest and last child, transcendentalism, Free Religion remands the soul back to itself; with a voice seemingly stern, yet in reality profoundly tender, bids it love the truth even more than its own hopes; and creates in it such strength of faith in Nature, such reverence for the facts and laws of Being, that it looks calm and undismayed on all possibilities. Whether the world knows it or not, this emancipation from spiritual fear is what it most profoundly needs. Not until men dare to choose the truth, be it what it may, will they ever find it. Thus, instead of a theology, Free Religion constructs a massive intellectual character, self-centred and equipoised, willing that science and philosophy shall determine in all things what the truth is, and eager to welcome it when found.

Instead of a church, Free Religion aims to construct the Commonwealth of Man, on the universal recognition of human brotherhood. A perfect social order whose law shall be that of equal justice and permanent good-will,—this it is to-day constructing, notwithstanding the obstructive action of organized Christianity. We need not dwell on this point. Secular rather than ecclesiastical, Free Religion is at work about us in millions of hearts that know not by what they are thus impelled to labor for the future republic of mankind.

Are not these real constructions? To us, they are infinitely beautiful and full of hope. No crash of systems or tottering of opinions can disturb our faith that truth is the architect of the future, and will build a nobler society than our wildest dream can picture. Let who will, doubt or fear,—we hail the coming dawn.

ABECEDARIAN PHILOSOPHY.—A little girl of our acquaintance was overheard taunting her younger brother, of about four years of age, with certain speculative theories of Mother Goose:—

"Snaps and snails
 And puppy-dogs' tails,— That's what little boys are made of."

"No, I ain't either!" was the sturdy response,
 "I'm made of heaven and earth!"

GIVE ME THE BLESSINGS OF TO-DAY.

BY M. A. B.

Gladly we muse upon the hours,
Bright with the dews of life's sweet morn;
Yet oh! how sad to think its flowers,
So fair, are faded now and gone!

A gentle hope may cheer the spirit,
Looking far onward for the prize;
But ere we gain a point to see it,
Perchance the prospect fades and dies!

'Tis only present time can fully Bestow on life its solid joys;
Though bright and sweet and smiling, truly,
Future and Past are fancy's toys.

Oh! let not envy, hate, or malice
Mar the sweet pleasures of to-day,
To gain the morrow's golden palace,—
Alas, such dreams soon melt away.

Love, truth, and gentle kindness cherish;
These flowers shall grace life's pleasant way.
What though ambitious hopes should perish?
Give me the blessings of to-day.

HAS GOD PROCLAIMED AN EXTERNAL RELIGION AMONG MEN?

DUNKIRK, April 27, 1870.

MR. EDITOR:—There are many beautiful things in your beautiful paper. I have thought of sending you something; but I cannot do the beautiful. To supply the place of what would be attractive, I will just say that I am an Irishman and a Catholic,—not a fossil, however, but alive and moving. You are putting on your specs, but you needn't, for nothing is coming of any account.

You know how we, that is Catholics, are bound—tied up neck and heels. Well, the mind will think, and sometimes will speak out, and what's said will be shaped by the surroundings.

It is a terrible thing to differ with God's Church; but when a man reads anything, which the Church does not like a man to do, he may come to discover that it is something of a job to tell which of a hundred, laying claim to the honor, is God's Church. I have, God help me, come to the conclusion that this is an honor to which each one of them all has a conspicuous want of title.

Here is a syllogism for you, one that I have smoked many a pipe over before it was finished; in fact, the job has taken me over six years labor:—

1. God will not punish a man for the non-belief in a religion which he has not proclaimed.
2. But God has not proclaimed any one of the external religions that claim man's belief.

3. Therefore God will not punish a man for the non-belief in any of the external religions that claim his belief.

The second proposition, or minor, is the one that requires to be proved. I prove it thus.

If God had organized and proclaimed an external religion as a necessity for man, there could be no two contradictory systems laying claim to the honor of being it; for the object of the proclamation would be to prevent or remove all ignorance and contention on the subject. But there always were, and are at present, many (perhaps a hundred) different and contradictory systems of religion,—each one claiming to be the one which God has proclaimed. Therefore, God has not proclaimed any one of them. Ignorance on the main point prevails among them all, there being not one of the hundred that is not, by the ninety-nine others, pronounced to be a counterfeit and an imposition.

Ask yourself what it is to proclaim a thing, say a mere human law? Is it not to advertise it, to publish it, to make all concerned know that it exists? Reflect that in this case, God himself is said to be the advertiser, the publisher, the proclaimer, and that the thing proclaimed is a religion, the non-observance of which is followed by such a penalty as the loss of soul and body; and when you so reflect, you will understand what the proclamation of his religion by God, must be. You will understand that it must be a process to render God's own religion conspicuous both to the eye and to the mind,—to remove every vestige of ignorance respecting its reality and identity, its claims and its truth.

There never was such a proclamation made of any one of the religions that have distracted, or that are now distracting mankind. The conclusion is evident.

THEOPHILUS.

FREEDOM AND CAUSATION.

WHITESBORO, April 5th 1870.

F. E. ABBOT:—I am a constant reader of THE INDEX, and am very much pleased with most of the ideas it advocates. Whether it is better to take a stand outside of Christianity, or to interpret Christianity as accordant with universal religion,—as the embodiment of those cognitions of the Absolute Unity, together with personal obligation to live at all times in accordance with our highest convictions of duty, of right, of the eternal proprieties of things, as the most excellent minds of all times have agreed upon,—is as yet somewhat uncertain in my mind.

The discourse on "Human Ideals" published in THE INDEX of April 2, while embodying very much truth, is, to my mind, open to criticism on one very important point. Agreeing with you that the point of moral responsibility begins with volition, and that we are evermore obligated to conform our lives strictly to the "Ideal of the Individual Soul," to welcome whatever may be demanded by our sense of right,—still we must recognize the chain of cause and effect, the immutable law of order, as presiding over the sphere of the voluntary as fully and implicitly as it does in the realm of the physical. The freedom of the Spirit is not of such a nature as to imply an event without its necessary cause. Even an act of choice is clearly predetermined by its antecedents, or otherwise we have a chance event. Firmly and inflexibly as I recognize obedience to each one's individual convictions to be the imperative law of the mind, it still pains me to see many reformers cling to the idea that responsibility presupposes any such freedom as destroys the law of causality—the law of necessity—the law of order, of harmony. If there is any one truth more certain to our intuitions than any other, it seems to me to be the one that all parts are united in one universal whole, that no event is isolated from all antecedents, but that every particular—every volition even—is as indissolubly connected with the supreme, unconditioned unity, as any physical effect is connected with its cause. Science tends in this direction—is based, in fact, on the law. Otherwise, what can we judge of character? How can we predict human conduct? Is there any more merit or demerit in a chance volition than in a necessitated one?

Responsibility refers to the certainty that suffering will follow a certain cause of conduct, and happiness another course.

The only possible ground as a basis on which to build undetermined freedom is the doctrine of Fichte, that there is no objective reality, either material or spiritual; that duration and space and God, and all things objective, are but the creations of our own consciousness; that the Ego, as impressions and ideas, is all there is, and here each one is himself the absolute, the unrelated, God. However these speculations may be, there is one, and but one, criterion for human conduct,—so to act, or refuse to act, as seems to us to be most fit, proper, and appropriate at the time. If immortality is true, it will be soon enough for us to know it when we attain it, or at least when the Beautiful Order impresses it upon our minds. Stand still and firm, living up to our convictions and trusting in the Eternal Reality.

MR. EDITOR:—Believing a few facts, concisely stated, in regard to the great facilities offered by this State to immigrants, would be of service to many who wish to change their present location for a better one, I have concluded to give them, and by their publication I am induced to believe you would confer a great favor on many persons. I have travelled over several States of the Union, and I can in truth say, taking all things into consideration, that this State, and especially this County,—Maury,—is the best I ever saw. As regards its healthfulness, I consider no locality to be superior; good facilities for schools; water and timber in abundance, and of excellent quality; and a spirit of enterprise is beginning to animate the people, and bring them out of the lethargy which was a concomitant of slavery. I believe that all this State lacks to make it "a bud and blossom as the rose" is a little Northern enterprise and capital. As regards the State being largely in debt, etc., I will remark that the State Debt proper is only about $3,473,000; the Railroad Debt being about $34,000,000, covered by bonds of these roads which are worth the amount. It is also believed that Congress will appropriate $10,000,000 to the State to cover losses sustained by loyal men during the late war, in which event our bonds would immediately go up to about par. In fact they are now sought for and bought by capitalists, both in this country and Europe, and keep steadily rising in value. Land in this county sells for from $5 to $200 per acre, owing to the improvements thereon, fertility, and nearness to towns. In adjoining counties land can be bought at 12½ cents to one dollar per acre; and thousands of acres of this land is of sufficient fertility to enable the cultivator to make a good living, and lay up something for a rainy day. The winters are generally mild, and cattle, horses, sheep, etc., are in many sections fed but little; hogs often make excellent pork at Christmas with nothing to feed on but acorns, which are generally abundant. I am a Surveyor and Engineer, and have surveyed thousands of acres in this and adjoining counties, and know what I say to be true. I know of places well improved, good houses, water, timber, etc., etc., which can be bought at from 70 cents to $5 per acre.

Not to make this communication too lengthy, I will state to all who may wish more light on the subject, that I will answer all questions in full, giving minute descriptions of different farms for sale, with prices, etc., on receipt of one dollar. As a full answer to a letter of inquiry requires a communication of three or four pages, I am compelled to employ help to answer them. I either must have a small fee or lose much in my correspondence.

RELIGION.

MATTOON, ILL., May 18, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—Will you permit me to indicate my views on Religion in your excellent INDEX.

"1st. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself." (Plain enough.)

"2nd. The root of religion is universal human nature." (True as the first proposition—but not as plain. If "human nature" was understood, there would be no need of amplification.)

Man is the intermediate in the vast chain of being, which terminates at the one end in the incomprehensible atom—and at the other end in the incomprehensible Jehovah. An exact epitome of the whole chain; in all the lower links in fact, and in all the upper ones in anticipation,—with this truth, always to be borne in mind, that the upper link is Infinite. All the others, being finite, must of necessity be religious. Look up to,—reach up to,—grow up to,—worship the Jehovah. I think it will be conceded that Equity is the fundamental principle of Jehovah, whose attributes are Infinite Will, Infinite Wisdom and Infinite Love.

Man, being the child of God, must partake of his principle and attributes. Equity prompts to do unto others as you would that they should do unto you.

Will is the motive power that moves all matter. Wisdom is the power of discerning what is best. And Love is the universal Law that draws everything to itself, for a purpose. When hatred, in any of its phases, is drawn to and comes in contact with this Christ—Dove or Paraclete, it is reproved thereby, and the soul that harbored this malignity is liberated from the gall of bitterness, love always being united to the other two attributes, Wisdom and Will. Whatever the malady of the soul, whether it be malevolence, folly, or weakness, it finds legitimate remedy in this Trinity.

And this Trinity is always found, if found at all, within the individual seeker. It is the parent of all genuine revelation. Hence all history of revelation, whether it be Pagan, Jew, Mohammedan, or Christian, that elevates man, is corroborative evidence to each individual soul.

HAZE AND DUST.

[From the Technologist.]

Dr. Tyndall, of the Royal Institution of England, has recently brought to the attention of the scientific world, some new and striking phenomena, relating to the suspension of atoms in the atmosphere. We consider the subject worthy of the most careful attention; therefore, in common with other journals, we present the facts. The Professor's views were admirably illustrated in a lecture upon the subject, delivered at the Royal Institution, London, where his admirable experimental manipulation greatly assisted the demonstration of his views. Professor Tyndall opened his lecture by sending a beam of light from the electric lamp across the darkened room, and its track was visible, because it illuminated the dust floating in the air, just as sunlight does when it passes through a darkened space. He referred to the fact, that while engaged upon experiments with air and vapors confined in a large glass tube, he was very much troubled with the presence of this dirt in the atmosphere. In order to purify the air, he first passed it through a U tube, filled with fragments of marble, moistened with caustic potash, in order to take up the carbonic acid gas; then the air was passed through another U tube, filled with pulverized glass, moistened with sulphuric acid, which dried the air, because of the great affinity of this acid, for water. The experimental tube was then prepared and exhausted of its contained air, and the purified air which had passed through the two U tubes above mentioned, was admitted to it. Nevertheless, upon the transmission of parallel beams of light of great intensity through the tube, the purified air was seen to be full of floating particles. Upon attempting to get rid of this, the Professor happened to conceive the idea of passing the air over the top of a spirit flame, at a point where it entered the first one of the U tubes, and to his astonishment he found that the floating matter was totally destroyed. Before this experiment was tried, he supposed the dust in the air of London to consist, for the most part, of something like the sand of the desert of Sahara, completely incombustible; the experiment proved that it was organic matter, that could be burnt. He then had a small gas furnace constructed, by means of which a platinum tube could be brought to a state of vivid redness. This tube was filled with platinum gauze, and the air passed through the red, white-hot tube and gauze before admission through the stop-cock into the empty experimental tube of glass. When the air was allowed to pass slowly through the hot tube, so that it lingered a little in its passage, all the floating particles were destroyed; but when it was made to pass rapidly, a blue blaze was seen in the illuminated experimental tube. It was, in fact, filled with the smoke of the organic particles, this smoke not having remained long enough in the red-hot tube, to be burnt. The optical character of the blue cloud was entirely different from that of the dust which produced it; at right angles to the beam it discharged perfectly polarized light, the cloud could be totally dispelled by means of a transparent Nicol's prism, and the tube containing it reduced to optical emptiness. The lecturer then sent an intense parallel beam of white light across the room, and received it upon a concave mirror which brought all the rays to a brilliant focal point. By means of this plan he said he had endeavored to burn up the particles in the air at the focus of a concave reflector, but failure was the result, although the heat at the focus was so great that it would readily inflame paper, as the experiment proved. There was so much motion in the air of the room that the rapid passage of the particles through the focus probably aided their escape. In his next experiment, the lecturer held a spirit lamp below the bright beam of light tracking its way across the lecture hall, and the beam was disturbed by what appeared to be clouds of black smoke rising from the smokeless flame. Pure hydrogen flame which produces only vapor of water, by combustion, and can by no possibility give off carbonaceous smoke, also seemed to disturb the beam, with black clouds. What, then, was this blackness? It was simply stellar space, that is to say, blackness from the absence of particles in the heated air, capable of scattering the light of the beam.

The same blackness may be produced by holding a red-hot iron or copper ball beneath the beam of light, but the most curious fact is, that when the metal has cooled till its temperature is below that of boiling water, dark feeble currents are still produced. This is because the air around the metal ball is warmed, expands and becomes lighter, and rises, but the heat does not equally rarefy the floating matter. Consequently, a convection current of pure air rises upwards among the particles, dragging them after it right and left, but forming within them an impassable black partition. Professor Tyndall next held a glass flower shade in such a position that the beam of light passed through it; then he permitted a stream of pure hydrogen gas, free from particles, to rise to the top of the inside of the shade through a tube. The light gas accumulated at the top of the shade, pressing out the air below, so that when the hydrogen replaced the air, a dark section seemed to be cut out of the beam, which then became invisible inside the shade, although outside, in both directions, it was as visible as ever, because of the illumination of the floating particles. This dirt in the air we are constantly churning in our lungs. A small portion of it is probably deadly to man. Sometime ago it was a current belief that epidemic diseases were propagated by malaria consisting of organic matter in a state of decay, which entered the human body through the lungs or skin, and then produced decay of the body, just as a little yeast will leaven the whole lump. Cagniard de la Tour, in 1836, gave a wonderful reply to this, by proving that the process set up by the yeast plant is one of life and not of decay. Schwann, of Berlin, announced, in 1837, that when a decoction of meat is screened from common air, and supplied solely with air which has been raised to a high temperature, putrefaction never sets in; so that something contained in the air is destroyed by the heat. Also about the same time the "germ theory" of epidemic disease was started, ascribing the spread of epidemic diseases to germs carried by the air from the sufferer to the healthy subject. This theory is now continually gathering strength. Again, surgeons have long known the danger of permitting the air to enter an open abscess, so that special instruments are used in case of operations performed, to prevent the access of it; but, notwithstanding all this care, inflammation oftentimes sets in again, and matter discharged from the second abscess, unlike that from the first, is fetid and full of little living organisms called vibrios. This shows how careful surgeons should be to cleanse their instruments; but how can they do so effectually with so much dirt present in the atmosphere, without subjecting them to a considerable amount of heat? Helmholtz, the philosopher, suffers annually from hay fever; it usually attacks him about the 20th of May, and does not leave him until the end of June. By means of microscopical examination he has discovered that during that period his nasal secretions were peopled with vibrios.

These are serious facts, and the lecturer proceeded to state that Dr Budd, of Bristol, who is devoting his attention to this subject of the germ theory of disease, deserves a fair field to work in, though he may be a little too enthusiastic. Professor Tyndall then filled his lungs with air, and permitted it to escape slowly into the beam through a glass tube which had been warmed, so as to prevent the condensation of the vapor in the breath. At first the breath was as full of particles as the air in the room, but when the first portion from the throat had passed away, the remainder from the lungs caused a dark band in the bright beam. This proves, he said, that the dirt which enters with the air lodges itself in the lungs—a portion perhaps being taken up previously by the cilia of the throat. He then held a handful of cotton wool before the mouth and nose, and inhaled air through the wool. Upon breathing out through the warm glass tube this filtered air into the bright beam of light, the whole of it—the first part as well as the last—was seen to be quite free from the particles of dirt. A cotton-wool respirator, therefore, will keep the dirt, and probably disease germs, out of the lungs—a fact which physicians ought to know. Cotton-wool has been used by philosophers, to purify the air used in experiments in cases of spontaneous generation. He had such confidence in cotton-wool, that he would not hesitate in his own proper person to test its efficacy by entering under its protection any atmosphere poisoned by the presence of persons suffering from virulent diseases. By means of cotton-wool, he thought that air of Alpine purity might be brought into the chamber of the invalid.

Beecher classifies Congregationalists as "dry Baptists"—not meaning thirsty, by any means.

WHY ONE WOMAN WAS OPPOSED TO WOMAN'S ENFRANCHISEMENT.

Not long since, I rang the bell at one of those prettily, new dwellings, so gratifying to the eye in its architectural design, that are so fast adorning our New England villages. My object in calling was to interest the lady, who presided in this beautiful home, in our Woman's Suffrage Association. After the usual cordial welcome, I said, very cheerily:

"Did you attend the State Convention which met at—?"

Her face at once assumed a hue—you may, some of you, have seen something of the kind, a color that might indicate sudden scarlatina, if it was in the immediate vicinity—a look, as it was, that savored more of the feeling within, that just then all her individual rights were in danger of being wrested from her by the woman's ballot.

"No, indeed, I did not attend that Convention, and I don't believe in women voting. I think they had better mind their own business at home, and let the men take care of theirs," was her not very gentle reply.

She seemed quite accustomed to "speech-making," and "impressive gesticulation" of some sort, if not in the affirmative of the now vexed question. But, remembering that a "soft answer turneth away wrath," and knowing how much pride she took in her new home, I replied:

"But do you know how unjust some of our laws are? Would you be content, if your husband should be taken away from you by death, with the use of one-third of this beautiful place?"

You ought to have seen the toss of her head, (I couldn't put that on paper, if I had the best artist's skill,) as she exclaimed,

"The whole place is mine. I have taken care of that. My husband has deeded it all to me."

She knew how to emphasize the "all" and "me."

"But every one is not so fortunate," said I. "Think of the many who could never have a deed of their home, if they desired it ever so much, or worked ever so hard to obtain it. And how many other laws more unjust than this. How can we ever help such, but by helping them to the ballot-box?"

Her unfeeling reply was, "I have all the rights I want; other women must look out for themselves."

Again I pleaded, "There are many who, if they tried ever so hard, could never secure their rights; ought we not to remember such?"

"I can have mine; that's enough for me; I shan't trouble myself about others."

How heart-sickening is such supreme selfishness! I have always longed for a pretty little home of my own, with means to beautify and adorn it as I liked, and I remembered, as I left, that when she first told me about her new home, I almost envied her. But I looked upon it now with far different feelings. Even its very walls seemed written over with the curse, "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he shall also cry and shall not be heard."

What a phase of poor human nature! "She had all the rights she wanted, and others must take care of themselves." Supreme selfishness made her not a "woman's rights woman."—MRS JANE ELIZA FOOTE, in the Woman's Journal.

MAZZINI.

Joseph Mazzini, the Italian patriot, in a late letter gives utterance to the following melancholy reflections:—"With the exception of a few bright spirits, I no longer esteem the generation for which I am working. That generation is an instrument, nothing more. The generation which we are marching with has fatal instincts, reactions and impulses, sometimes hatreds; and above all, is accustomed to fight. We may, we must, try and get something out of it which will smooth the ground and pave the way for the future. But we cannot sympathize with it; we cannot rejoice and suffer with it; we cannot grasp cordially the hand of those who stand by us in the fight. This generation has opinions, but no faith. It denies the existence of God, of immortality, of love, the eternal promise, the future of those who love, the belief in an intelligent and providential law, all that is beautiful, good and holy in the world—a whole heroic trinity of religious feeling, from Prometheus to Christ, from Socrates to Kepler, but grovels on its knees before Comte and Buechner. This generation studies passing phenomena, but ignores the causes that produce them. It admits law, but ignores the law-giver—the form without the substance—the means without the end. As an inevitable consequence, it is a Machiavellic generation, all for expediency and tactics—but a stranger to the moral sense, to the consciousness of the holiness of its work, to the power of truth."

It is certainly gratifying to know that in—, Illinois, the Young Men's Christian Association is doing a good work. One of its most active members is Mr. —, a young gentleman of position and means, who has done much in aiding the poor and unfortunate. At one time he became quite interested in a German family in indigent circumstances. The wife was quite sick, and he visited her very often, doing all he could to prepare her mind for the worst, if it should come to that. He had not seen her for a few days when he met the husband, and the following conversation took place:—

"How do you do, Mr. —? How is your wife?"

"Mein frau?—mein frau is dead?"

"Dead! is it possible? Was she resigned?"

"Resigned? resigned? Mein Gott! she had to be!" Harper's Magazine.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavins B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, West Newton, Mass.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

The Annual Meeting of the Association was held as advertised, on the 26th and 27th of May. But we have to defer further notice of its proceedings till next week.

UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

The Free Religious Association aims to do exact justice to the religious sentiment and thought which appear under all specific forms of religion. Not accepting for its basis any special religion as given by divine authority to be an ultimate standard of truth and morals, it brings to this study of comparative Theology no predetermined artificial test by which to try the different religions, but only the scientific test which the human mind itself offers; and so it is free to recognize whatever truths and virtues there may be in any of the religions for just what they are in themselves. In the unity and universality of religious ideas, in the natural sympathy that is found to exist between religions whose forms of doctrine and worship may be very different, seems to be indicated the pathway by which mankind are to advance to the realization of one universal religion. And it is to help, if possible, towards this sublime realization that the Free Religious Association exists. This, at least, is one of its objects.

But there is evidently some confusion of thought in the use of the phrase "Universal Religion." It makes all the difference in the world whether one says "Universal Religion" or "The Universal Religion." "Universal Religion" properly means those elements of thought and sentiment wherein all religions agree, and which makes the common basis of all specific religious systems. "The Universal Religion" is that ideal moral and spiritual fellowship into which, it is hoped and believed, humanity is steadily advancing, and wherein the boundaries of specific religions with their local and personal authorities will be lost in the common allegiances of true thought and true life. "Universal Religion," is something that, with a requisite comparison and generalization of facts, can be scientifically grasped and stated. "The Universal Religion," or, as it is sometimes called, "the Absolute Religion," it is given to no mortal to comprehend or define. Who will venture to measure all the truth, all the virtues, all the beatitudes, all the high spiritual experiences and aspirations, which shall belong to man in his future destiny on this planet? Yet nothing short of a statement which shall cover all the moral and spiritual possibilities of the human race on the earth can be an adequate definition of "The Universal Religion." It is an Ideal,—one of the magnificent possibilities towards which the race is moving,—but not anything which can be systematically stated or mechanically inaugurated.

Yet some persons, apparently confounding these two conceptions, seem to think that the Free Religious Association proposes to establish the Universal Religion by simply leaving out the peculiar features of all the specific religions and mechanically combining them on the ground of their common elements. This, in our opinion, is a misconception of the position which the Association takes. Religions grow; they are not made. And the Universal Religion is to grow. It is to come by natural organic development. The special religions, after having served some providential purposes in the education of the race, will gradually open into it, and it will absorb and assimilate whatever is really vital and permanent in the creeds and codes of all religions and all races. The universal elements of religion, which have produced various local, ethnic, and personal forms of faith, will finally produce the religion of humanity. It is not a going back to the bare elements; it is an organic process of advance into richer and more positive and more purely spiritual forms of combination of the elements.

And we have to come to that epoch, when there appear in several of the great historic religions very marked signs of progressive movement on converging lines towards a common faith and fellowship. It is this grand movement to which the Free Religious Association in this feature of its work would strive in some way to give voice. It does not expect to shape it; it does not profess to organize it. It, rather, is organized by it. It simply desires in some way to represent it, to give it expression and utterance, to remove barriers and help it onward. And one way to do this is to emphasize the things that are common to all the religions; to point out the great primal intuitions that have found voice in every historic faith; to remand faith back to its ultimate sources in human conscience and intelligence; to show the germs which hold the promise of this Universal Religion. But the Religion is to grow,—it will not be made.

PAGAN VOICES.

"All parts of the universe are interwoven with each other, and so linked together by nature, in a sacred bond of union, that no one thing is distinct from, or unconnected with, some other,—the whole being regularly disposed, and forming this beautiful system which we call the world. For this world, though comprehending all things, is but one; as there is one God that pervades all things; one mass of matter out of which all things are formed; one law, the common reason of all intelligent creatures; one truth and perfection of all beings of the same kind and partaking of the same rational nature.

"However other people act or talk, my business is to be good. We should be as true to our nature as are inanimate beings; an emerald, suppose, or gold, or purple. Let envy or malice do or say what they please, I shall still be an emerald, keep my color, and shine on in defiance of them.

"It is the peculiar excellence of man, to love even those who have offended him. This you will be disposed to do, if you reflect that the offender is allied to you; that he did it through ignorance, and, perhaps, involuntarily; and, moreover, that you will both soon go peacefully to your graves. But above all consider that he has not really injured you, as he could not render your mind, or governing part, the worse by his offence.

"Adorn your character with simplicity and modesty, and with indifference to external advantages, and things of no intrinsic value. Love mankind and be resigned to Providence.

"Look into your own bosom; for you have there a fountain of happiness, if you will search for it and suffer it to flow without interruption.

"Take care not to behave towards the most inhuman, as they too frequently behave towards their fellow-creatures.

"It is the perfection of virtue to spend every day as if it were your last; and neither act with precipitation, nor with indolence, nor with insincerity.

"Though the gods are immortal, and must necessarily bear with the wickedness of mankind through endless ages, they do not lose their patience; but even extend their providential care over them on all occasions. And do you, who are just going off the stage of life, and are yourself one of those wicked mortals, despair of a reformation?" MARCUS AURELIUS.

"A wise and good man, mindful who he is and whence he came, and by whom he was produced, is attentive only how he may fill his post regularly and dutifully before God. 'Dost Thou wish me still to live? Let me live free and noble, as Thou desirest; for Thou hast made me incapable of restraint in what is my own. But hast Thou no farther use for me? Farewell! I have staid thus long through Thee alone, and no other; and now I depart in obedience to Thee.'—'How do you depart?'—Still as Thou wilt; as one free, as thy servant, as one sensible of thy commands and prohibitions. But, while I am employed in Thy service, what wouldst Thou have me to be? A prince, or a private man; a senator, or a plebeian; a soldier, or a general; a preceptor, or a master of a family? Whatever post or rank Thou shalt assign me,—like Socrates, I will die a thousand times rather than desert it. Where wouldst Thou have me to be? At Rome, or at Athens; at Thebes, or at Gyarus? Only remember me there. If Thou shalt send me where men cannot live conformably to nature, I will not depart unbidden, but upon a recall as it were sounded by Thee. Even then I do not desert Thee; Heaven forbid! But I perceive that Thou hast no use for me. If a life conformable to nature be granted, I will seek no other place but that in which I am; nor any other company but those with whom I dwell.

If you are at Gyarus, do not represent to yourself the manner of living at Rome; how many pleasures you used to find there, and how many would attend your return; but dwell rather on this point,—how he who must live at Gyarus, may live there nobly. And if you are at Rome, do not represent to yourself the manner of living at Athens; but consider only how you ought to live where you are.

Lastly, for all other pleasures, substitute the consciousness that you are obeying God, and performing not in word, but in deed, the duty of a wise and good man. How great a thing it is to be able to say to yourself: "What others are now solemnly arguing in the schools, and can state in paradoxes, this I put in practice. Those qualities which are there discoursed, disputed, celebrated, I have made my own. Zeus hath been pleased to let me recognize this within myself, and himself to discern, whether he hath in me one fit for a soldier and a citizen, and to employ me as a witness to other men concerning things uncontrollable by will. See that your fears were vain, your appetites vain. Seek not good from without: seek it within yourselves, or you will never find it. For this reason he now brings me hither, now sends me thither; sets me before mankind, poor, powerless, sick; banishes me to Gyarus; leads me to prison; not that he hates me—Heaven forbid! For who hates the most faithful of his servants? Nor that he neglects me, for he neglects not one of the smallest things; but to exercise me and to make use of me as a witness to others. Appointed to such a service, do I still care where I am, or with whom, or what is said of me, instead of being wholly attentive to God and to his orders and commandments?" EPICTETUS.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

THE PROBLEM SOLVED.—A young lady, riding in the rear car of a long train, remarked to her companion that the train seemed to move very slowly; and a moment after, added with almost Partingtonian unconsciousness, "but perhaps it is because we are in the last car."—Herald of Health.

A FABLE BY CHARLES LAMB.—"My dear children," said an old rat to his young ones, "the infirmities of age are pressing so heavily upon me, that I have determined to dedicate the remainder of my days to mortification and penance, in a narrow and lonely hole which I have lately discovered; but let me not interfere with your enjoyments. Youth is a season for pleasure; be happy, therefore, and only obey my last injunction, never come near my retreat. God bless you all." Deeply affected, snivelling audibly, and wiping his paternal eyes with his tail, the old rat withdrew, and was seen no more for several days, when his youngest daughter, moved rather with filial affection than by that curiosity which has been attributed to the sex, stole to his cell of mortification, which turned out to be a hole made by his own teeth, in an enormous Cheshire cheese!

A case of disputed possession of a child was recently before a New Orleans Court, of two women each claiming the boy as her son. The court was wearied with the case, and annoyed by the repeated applications for his interference.

"The boy belongs to both of them," he said. "But, your Honor," interposed an attorney, "that can't be." One or the other must be his mother.

"Both of them!"

"A child can't have two mothers."

"Oh! yes he can."

"I don't understand it."

"The Scriptures say a man must be born twice; and I'd like to know the reason a boy can't; the boy's got two mothers," and clinging to this view the case was dismissed.

A venerable African of Galesburg, thus sums up the alterations that make the Constitution what it is: "God Almighty made ten commandments, Abe Lincoln made three, and General Grant made two, and hallelujah, bress God, we kin vote."

Beautiful Women!

All women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty? Women know, too, that when men speak of the intellect of women, they speak critically, tamely, coolly; but when they come to speak of the charms of a beautiful woman, their language and their eyes kindle with an enthusiasm which shows them to be profoundly, if not, indeed, ridiculously in earnest. It is part of the natural sagacity of women to perceive all this, and therefore employ every allowable art to become the goddess of that adoration. Preach to the contrary, as we may, against the arts employed by women for enhancing their beauty, there still stands the eternal fact, that the world does not prefer the society of an ugly woman of genius to that of a beauty of less intellectual acquirements. The world has yet allowed no higher mission to woman than to be beautiful, and it would seem that the ladies of the present age are carrying this idea of the world to greater extremes than ever, for all women now to whom nature has denied the talismanic power of beauty, supply the deficiency by the use of a most delightful toilet article, known as the "Bloom of Youth," which has been lately introduced into this country by GEORGE W. LAIRD, a delicate beautifier, which smooths out all indentations, furrows, scars; removing tan, freckles, and discolorations from the skin, leaving the complexion clear, brilliant, and beautiful, the skin soft and smooth. With the assistance of this new American trick of a Lady's toilet, female beauty is destined to play a larger part in the admiration of men and the ambition of women than all the arts employed since her creation. Prof. C. F. Chandler, Chemist to the Metropolitan Board of Health, has recently prepared a chemical analysis of this delightful toilet preparation, and reported that the "Bloom of Youth" was harmless, containing nothing injurious to the health. Ladies need have no fear of using this invaluable toilet acquisition.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

[Read to the Unitarian Society, Dover, N. H., Feb. 18, 1866.]

There are three great ideas of human destiny, or rather three great forms of one and the same idea, which I propose to consider this morning, and which, for convenience' sake, I will name respectively the Pagan, the Christian, and the Radical. The essence of these three conceptions is faith in a GOLDEN AGE of humanity,—an age when every defect in human virtue and happiness is rectified, and universal peace reigns in undisturbed supremacy in the soul within and the world without,—an age when misery and sin are forever abolished, and the last discordant note dies out in the choral music of the spheres. This faith, in some form or other, I regard as essential to the noblest living, the purest feeling, and the truest thinking; it must exist in every one who perceives the sad discrepancy between the actual and the possible condition of mankind and yet believes in better things. To have lost all faith in an Age of Gold is a most terrible disaster, implying, as it does, either contentment with the poor, meagre, and unsatisfactory present, or else a conviction that nothing higher and grander is within the reach of human faculties. Visions of the Golden Age, whether called by that name or not, have always floated, and will always float, before the spiritual eye of every true and noble soul. They are its protest against the injustice, coarseness, and insufficiency of actual facts; they are its inward picture of that which ought to be, its ideal of a better state of things. But I hasten to describe the three main forms which this idea of a Golden Age has assumed among men, and which must perforce largely influence their views of human life, and the spirit in which they approach its duties.

1. The Pagan Idea of the Golden Age flings it far back into the past,—into that dim and misty antiquity which remains dumb as the Sphinx to human interrogation. The birth of the race was the entrance upon an existence at first devoid of all labor, pain, and wrong: the heavens never grew black or sullen, the winds were never wintry, the earth never withheld its spontaneous gifts of flowers and fruits, the gods never abandoned the groves or fields, and men never sullied the unbroken beauty of Nature by acts of violence or unkindness. Conscience was the only law-giver, and courts were unknown; no pines fell in the forest to become sea-going ships,—no ores were dug from the mines to be smelted and forged into spears, bucklers, or swords,—no walls girded the happy towns,—no cares or sorrows or wants afflicted the guileless race of men. Thus Ovid, the old Roman poet, with glowing fancy, depicts the Golden Age as a period when joy and innocence, peace and prosperity filled the earth, and made it a fit abode for the celestials. But the Age of Gold was followed by an Age of Silver, and that by an Age of Brass, and that by an Age of Iron; in which crimes and woes crept in by degrees, poisoned the atmosphere, corrupted the hearts of men, and disarranged the courses of Nature, turning Elysium into Erebus. From age to age, the race hopelessly degenerates; and if, as Virgil prophesies, the Golden Age returns, it is only as the first step in a new cycle of deteriorations. The sad tale of decline and eclipse must be repeated, and the future comes always laden with bitterly increasing evil.

This, then, is the Pagan idea of human destiny,—a constant descent from virtue and happiness to wickedness and woe. It is based on utter despair of Man and God, for Man has no power to maintain himself, and God has either no power or else no will to restore him. Hope becomes folly, and courage a mere stoical endurance of inevitable ills. The stream of history, like the storied river of Sahara, starts on its course fresh and full, only to sink and disappear in the thirsty sand.

2. The Christian Idea of human destiny divides the Golden Age between the past and the future, and thus engrafts itself upon the Pagan Idea just described. Among the Jews, the garden of Eden, with its Adam and Eve created in innocence, but losing through disobedience their happy state, corresponds to the Golden Age among the Greeks and Romans; while, in the conception of a Messianic Kingdom which shall reverse the process of decay, and bring back the blessedness of Paradise to earth once more, they add a new element,—crude, perhaps, but full of beauty and hope. From the Jews, Christianity accepts the story of Eden and its primal pair, as the very foundation of its doctrines; while, in its acceptance of Jesus as the promised Messiah, it places the Messianic kingdom in the advent of the so-called Milennium, that is, the final and universal triumph of Christ himself over sin, death, and hell.

We here find the Golden Age appearing at either end of human history, whose course is thus no longer a uniform descent, but rather a plunge and subsequent re-ascension. Man, by his own power alone fails to perpetuate his Age of Gold, and suffers himself to descend to the bottom of the scale; he falls into helpless degradation, and but for the interposition of God would perish utterly. In this notion of a state of primeval purity, of a disastrous fall from it, and of a dreary immersion in deeper and deeper iniquity from which escape is impossible, Christianity borrows the very worst ideas of Paganism,—it copies its horrible despair of Man, and thus accuses God's creation of a fatal flaw and imperfection. But it attains to a true faith in God, so far, at least, as to believe that he both can and will restore the lost equilibrium of his moral universe; and thus the popular belief adds to the Pagan despair of Man a Christian faith in God, and attempts to neutralize the poison it has administered by an equal dose of antidote. Over against the "Fall of Adam," it sets the "Ascension of Christ" and consequent redemption of mankind. It begins with a Golden Age which is lost by Man's weakness and wickedness; it ends with a new Golden Age restored by God's free grace and bounty.

3. The Radical Idea of human destiny is that of gradual and constant progress,—for the race, if not for the individual. It admits no Golden Age in the past, as compared with the present. Beginning with ignorance and brutishness, Man ever ascends, and

"Each to-morrow Finds him farther than to-day."

The Golden Age is never in his rear, but ever flies before him, holding out rich promises, which it no sooner performs than it straightway promises more and better. In one sense, every age is an Age of Gold to that which precedes; and we shall find no age so truly golden as that which is now plastic metal in our hands. But in another sense, the Golden Age is flung far into the future, as that ultimate perfection which is always coming, but never comes. What Science is slowly but surely establishing as the true origin of Man, shows him to have been no perfect and ideal being, in the full possession of every faculty; but rather a low and undeveloped creature, ill-fitted to be the hero of a Golden Age. The romance of the Fall is the wail of despair; it is the abnegation of all faith in Man, the requiem of his hope to be the real child of God. The Pagan Idea of human destiny has faith neither in Man nor God; the Christian Idea has faith in God, but none in Man; the Radical Idea has faith, profound and earnest, in both Man and God. To the age that precedes, every age is golden; but the perfect Golden Age, for which we long, is not attained in finite times. It will still shine before mankind in their upward path, a foregleam of the perfection towards which they endlessly move. In history as a whole, there is no diminuendo, but one grand orchestral crescendo,—the ever swelling anthem of a world worshipping more truly than it knows. The beauty of the work is the workman's praise; and the eternal laws of God, which men cannot thwart nor even understand, ensure a progress of the race that renders every age in turn an Age of Gold.

These same ideas which I have tried to trace in their application to the history of the human race, reappear in the sphere of individual observation and experience. We are all haunted by visions of a Golden Age, which some of us find in the past, and others in the future. How hard it is to find it in the present! Yet if we fail to catch the glimmer of its wings to-day, we shall hunt for it in vain in yesterday or to-morrow.

Who has no yearnings towards his vanished childhood,—no tenderness for the scenes and forms that have passed away forever? The careless merriment and freedom from anxiety, the fresh gush of life and the keen relish of every pleasure, the childish intimacies which years or miles have broken up forever, the constant sense of loving protection from all harm,—who can remember these without a quicker pulsation of the heart, or help hearing in their swarming and ever-whispering memories the echoes of an Age of Gold? All the sorrows forgotten and the joys remembered,—all the thorns stripped off, and only the roses left behind,—then surely life was richer and deeper, and wore a golden hue. The joy of a young heart surrounded by friends and beautiful sights and scenes,—is there a truer Golden Age than that? It may seem not; yet if God should grant the wild wish to renew that lost epoch, who, think you, would be content to make the exchange? The thorns would again prick and wound the flesh; the forgotten discomforts would again sting and chafe; the gilding which Father Time had thinly laid on would wear away; the spell of enchantment would be rudely broken.

Or is it lost innocence that holds us in such reverential contemplation of our childhood? Our innocence was in large measure ignorance and weakness; it was only the bloom upon the peach that was meant to perish at a touch,—the mere vacuity and unripeness of thoughtless existence. There is a wonderful beauty in the freshness of the blossom; but what folly to exchange the matured fruit for it! Better the bronzed and scarred and battered features of the veteran, than the smooth cheek of the boy. Truly, beautiful as is childhood in its place and season, I think very poorly of one who would give up the results of manly toil and vigor to regain it. Not behind us lies the Golden Age; with all Time's adornments, the past is, at best, only a Gilded Age. No one has more beautifully uttered this idealizing reverence for childhood than Wordsworth:—

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises with us, our Life's Star,

Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar.
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home,
Heaven lies about us in our infancy;
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
And sees it in his joy;
The youth, who daily farthest from the East
Must travel, still is Nature's Priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended;
At length the man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day."

True is it, divinely true, that "Heaven lies about us in our infancy;" yet if it be any less true that Heaven lies about us now in our manhood, we were faithless to it in our infancy, and to repeat our infancy would but be to double our disaster. I have more sympathy with the lines of a poet less known, and more rugged in rhythm as in temper:—

"How has thy life been spent, that, in those years
When Time should hail thee master, thou wouldst still Tread backward to the senseless age of tears,
To be once more the slave of others' will,
And live a weeping, creeping, cowering thing,
Rather than crown thyself o'er self a king?"

No, the Golden Age is not behind us. We mould our own times, and make them golden or brazen, silver or iron, as we will; and if ever the Age of Gold is hereafter to be, it must now and here begin. Fleet as the years must we be, and tireless as they, if we would not lag behind ourselves, and suffer our possible to outstrip our actual. If we look ahead, all Time is golden,—if we look behind, it turns to brass.

Let no one despise these visions and aspirations after a Golden Age. They testify to the greatness and nobility of Man's nature, that bids him reach up and beyond his actual attainments. No man will ever be better than he aims to be. He may shoot below his aim, but he never shoots above it. If progress is anything but a dream,—if it is not a crazy presumption to expect that the night shall find us farther than the morning,—then the thought of this growing ideal will be our guide to God. Alas for him who learns to mock at his own ideal, as merely visionary and childish! It is our business to make it real, and when we connive at practices which violate its purity, or lessen its hold upon our affections, we are guilty of something worse than suicide. Our present is poor and mean, naked and meagre, compared with what we ought to make it; and there is no deadlier disease than the torpor which settles down into complacency over what is gained, and abandons the hope of a Golden Age to come. As a shell, put to the ear, sings and murmurs of the sea from whence it came, so the soul sings this song of the Age of Gold, as an echo of the Divine music of its source. It is indeed a song fit for the lips of celestials. If there is any meaning either in universal history, or in private experience, the key to it lies in the idea of a Golden Age to come, ever arriving but never arrived,—beginning with the present, and continuing with the unbounded future. It is the open secret of eternity, explaining much that is hard to comprehend, and throwing light on much that is obscure. Progress from good to better, from better to best,—that is the grand law which holds through all the ages, and flings over the dark places of human life the warm and beautiful sunshine of a hope divine. The present hour, unlovely as it may look, bears in its hand the fruitful germ of our Golden Age; it is for us to receive it gladly, and plant it faithfully. Here and now, if ever, must we realize our vision. Memory looks behind, and Hope before; but Wisdom finds the beauty of both in the living present. Our real wealth is alike the gift and product of the past, the germ and promise of the future; and in gratefully using to-day we best show our deep and abiding faith in to-morrow. The Golden Age is guaranteed by the very thought of God, who never formed this fair universe to fall into ruin, but makes its present imperfection minister to an ever-growing and expanding beauty. Onward and upward—is the watchword of humanity, the clarion call which summons it from strength to strength and from glory to glory. Our Age of Gold is with us now, if we perceive the divine lustre of life's common duties and experiences; and the chemistry of Time will but eliminate the dross which now alloys it.

"Old writers pushed the happy season back,
The more fools they,—we forward; dreamers both.
..... (for) well I know,
That unto him who works, and feels he works,
This same grand year is ever at the door."

THE WOMAN QUESTION.

[By Prof. William C. Russel, in the Cornell Era for March 23.]

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Please allow me a few lines for some considerations on the "woman question" and the probability of our institution being involved in it. Indeed, the great extent of the movement towards enlarging the sphere of education for women is remarkable. In our country its activity is in proportion to the cultivation and enterprise of different sections, and, without claiming it as any proof of the correctness of any opinion, it may be said that the progressive party is very unequally divided on the question. Before the late war was over there was a general conviction that the next battle would be about woman's rights to any education and any employment for which the might be fit.

In England, John Stuart Mill has thrown all the weight of his influence and his intellect in favor of giving them the privilege of voting, from which the question of education is inseparable, and his motion was supported by an unexpectedly large minority in the House of Commons. The Anglo-Saxon respect for women naturally places the two nations side by side in her cause. In Prussia, too, the Queen is at the head of a society of ladies whose object is to extend the sphere of female employment. When the Princess-royal of that country visited Paris and the Grand Exposition, she sent for Mr. Laboulaye for the sole purpose of talking with him about the education of the sexes in the same institutions. She told him of the Queen of England sending a commission to the United States to examine the institutions there, and quoted from their report the remarks of a professor of Antioch College about the capacity of women for mathematics. This of course, is proof only of the feeling on this subject of persons under very different circumstances from our own. Constantinople has a Turkish newspaper entirely devoted to the women's movement, and even India's coral strand is visited by the wave. Noble Mary Carpenter of Liverpool was kindly welcomed by the native husbands to whom she kindly offered to educate their wives and daughters. They did not want their religion to be interfered with, but she was warmly encouraged in her mission of instruction. The men said that they had observed that women were better wives and mothers and housekeepers for being educated, and they hailed the opportunity.

On the other hand, when the movement dashes against an old prejudice, the uproar is confounding. When the late Minister of Public Instruction in France, M. Duruy, proposed that the professors, graduates of the Normal School, should lecture to the Girls' Schools, M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, appealed to the church to rally to the rescue against an attempt, "which the exquisite truthfulness of the French language would not permit him to describe without violating the fastidious delicacy of French sentiment." The church did rally, and brave Monsieur Duruy has since been succeeded in the cabinet by one more careful of the ignorance of French school-girls.

In a recent number, The Era says that it is assured that the attempt to admit women to the privileges of the Cornell University would take from us some of our most honored and efficient Professors. I believe that there never was a greater mistake, never less foundation for one, and that your statement unintentionally does injustice to the entire Faculty. What their individual opinions on the subject may be, I do not know. I have heard only one express himself opposed, only one besides myself say that he was in favor of the measure, but that any one would leave if the women should be admitted I see no reason for believing. They are all and each too deeply interested in Cornell to be severed from it by the circumstance of women availing themselves of their legal right in this respect.

As to your own regrets, Messrs. Editors, allow me to sympathize with them. No one ever studied a young man without appreciating the fact and the importance of his temporary repugnance to the sex to whom he is one day to owe the richness and completeness of his being. Rudeness to sisters, restlessness under maternal influence, annoyance in the presence of any women, are as natural at some periods as any crisis of the constitution,—parts of an instinct wisely given and against which reason is powerless.

You were sorry that seven hundred students did not leave Michigan University when the Faculty decided to let women have their legal rights and come into recitations. Almost any young man would be so. The only woman there is taking the lead in most of the studies; at Antioch college, the women always took the lead in mathematics, as well as in history. Any young man in a state of nature would be uncomfortable under such liabilities.

Let us, however, while conceding the entire naturalness of the feeling, examine the position of the question in other relations, where the reason need not be influenced by feeling. We can generally appreciate a legal proposition, however disagreeable its application. We can often be just, even against our prejudices. To see the truth requires only an honest determination to be true to ourselves.

This University was founded on a grant of the proceeds of lands given by the State of New York, and of land and money by Mr. Cornell.

The lands granted by the State came from the Federal Government, which gave them for the support of at least one college for education in scientific and classical studies, as well as in others more specially insisted on. (See University Register, 1st ed., p. 23, sec. 4.)

The State of New York has granted the proceeds of these lands to our Trustees, to be applied to teaching not only agriculture, and the mechanic arts, and military tactics, but such other branches of science and knowledge as they may deem useful and proper. (Register, p. 14, sec. 4.) There is no discrimination as to the persons to whom education must be given, but the several departments are expressly thrown open to applicants for admission "without distinction as to rank, class, previous occupation or locality." (Register, p. 16, sec. 9.) Why was there no discrimination? Because the lands in the hands of either the general government or of the State had been held for the benefit equally of all citizens, without distinction. Every man, woman, boy and girl had an equal right and interest in them. Whatever use was to be made of them was to be regulated by a regard for the common good. If, in the opinion of the government of the United States, the common good would have been better promoted by appropriating them to the education of a class, it would have so limited them. It could have appropriated them exclusively to education in military tactics, and women would have been excluded; or to the education of female nurses, and men would have been shut out. But when the branches of education were to be equally within the power of all and equally valuable to all, there was no constitutional right of appropriating them exclusively to any portion of the community. They could not have been limited, for instance, to the education in scientific and classical studies of white children, or to children only of Saxon blood, or of any religious opinion. That would have been partial legislation. It would have been no less partial had such education been limited to male children.

But the State was not the only grantor. Mr. Cornell had his views, and has never intimated a wish to restrict the benefits of his donation. Every expression of a preference has been in the other direction. At the head of every number of your paper you print his catholic sentiment:—"I would found an institution where any person can find instruction in any study." His opinion, too, is sufficiently expressed by his often repeated answer to the question "whether women are to be admitted":—"There is nothing to hinder them—there is the law—why do they not come in?"

Believing, as I do, that every woman has a perfect right to apply for admission here, and that she should be subjected to only those moral and intellectual tests which we apply to men, and that on her passing them satisfactorily she should be admitted, the question whether they should use that right is one with which I should interfere with the greatest delicacy. There never has been a suggestion that injury would result to our sex from the measure; no one who has ever studied the matter doubts that in stimulus, refinement and purity, young men would be better for having women pursuing the same studies and receiving the same instruction with them. All the uneasiness is on account of the women; and before we set ourselves against their enjoying their legal rights of education, we should be very careful of the foundation of our anxieties about them. Consider the circumstances of their coming. They would not come as many young men do, to kill time, nor because they were difficult to manage at home, nor because they had failed to acquire any information under other teachers, nor because they were too young to be trusted in the world,—such considerations explain the presence at colleges of many a youth whose most intellectual feat is a sneer at admitting women. No, they would come because their friends believed them old enough and wise enough to face the common dangers of life; because they wanted instruction so earnestly that to gain it they would sacrifice a softer for a rougher home; and they would bring with them the feminine integrity and intuitive straightforwardness which place women beyond the attraction of dangers which our sex is too prone to burrow for. Again, if they came, they would not be left as our youth are, free from protection against those who would do them harm. Their own self-respect would protect them by a few regulations, which would provide for their comfort, their privacy and their safety. I was at Oberlin in 1867, and the President told me that the violation of such regulations was of rarest occurrence, and that within thirty years there had not been an instance of harm resulting from the system. We have no means at present of accommodating female students. We have neither boarding-houses sufficient, nor any dormitory for them, and until there are both of these, no young man need leave here from apprehension of their presence in the University. When they are admitted—as I believe they must be and will be—their surroundings will be such as to mitigate in a great measure the anxieties of their friends and classmates as to their possible danger.

Their anxieties, in my opinion, arise from an erroneous, though honest, under-estimate of the sex. Physically, their organization is finer than ours, and a very little observation shows them to be less under the influence than we of the animal part of our nature. No mistake is greater than to suppose that men and women are alike in natural temperament or that they suffer from the same temptations in the same degree. They have a nicer sense of moral order and beauty than we. They are more drawn toward what is pure, and true, and honest. Not their own fidelity but their natural constitution has made them more conscientious and loyal to a higher ideal. There is no woman-worship in appreciating that form of the Creator's energy as of a higher type than that which he has seen fit to manifest in us. They come from him with a superior organization in the scale of being, and with powers of self-restraint and moral aspiration proportionally greater. They ought to exercise the greatest purifying power over us—and they would do so if we understood them better and submitted more unreservedly to their influence. In my opinion, to admit women to our halls of education—not merely as pupils but as teachers; to admit them to the discussion of political and social duties; to receive their votes and to associate them in legislation,—that is, to say, to enable woman to exercise her influence, intellectual, social and moral, whenever she is inclined to do so and is capable of doing it—will prove one of the most important means of civilization that society will ever adopt.

ADDRESS OF COL. T. W. HIGGINSON AT MOUNT AUBURN, ON DECORATION DAY.

[From the Boston Journal.]

We meet to-day for a purpose that has the dignity and the tenderness of funeral rites, without their sadness. It is not a new bereavement, but one which time has softened, that brings us here. We meet not around a newly opened grave, but among those which nature has already decorated with the memories of her love. Above every tomb her daily sunshine has smiled, her tears have wept; over the humblest she has hidden some grasses nestle, some vines creep, and the butterfly—ancient emblem of immortality—waves his little wings above every sod. To Nature's signs of tenderness we add our own. Not "ashes to ashes, dust to dust," but blossoms to blossoms, laurels to laurels.

The great civil war has passed by—its great armies were disbanded, their tents struck, their camp fires put out, their muster rolls laid away. But there is another army whose numbers no Presidential proclamation could reduce, no general orders disband. This is their camping ground—these white stones are their tents—this list of names we bear is their muster roll—their camp-fires yet burn in our hearts.

I remember this sweet Auburn when no sacred associations made it sweeter, and when its trees looked down on no funerals but those of the bird and the bee. Time has enriched its memories since those days. And especially during our great war, as the nation seemed to grow impoverished in men, these hills grew richer in associations, until their multiplying wrath took in that heroic boy (Storow) who fell in almost the last battle of the war. Now that roll of honor has closed and the work of commemoration begun.

Without distinction of nationality, of race, of religion, they gave their lives to their country. Without distinction of religion, of race, of nationality, we guard their graves to-day. The young Roman Catholic convert who died exclaiming "Mary! pardon," (Shurtleff) and the young Protestant theological student, whose favorite place of study was the cemetery, and who asked only that no words of praise might be engraved on his stone, (Newcomb)—these bore alike the cross in their lifetime and shall bear it alike in the flowers to-day. They gave their lives that we might remain one nation, and the nation holds their memory alike in its arms.

And so the little distinctions of rank that separated us in the service, are nothing here. Death has given the same brevet to all. The brilliant young cavalry General who rode into his last action, with stars on his shoulders and his death wound on his breast (Lowell), is to us no more precious than that Sergeant of Sharpshooters who followed the line unarmed, at Antietam, waiting to take the rifle of some one who should die, because his own had been stolen, (Whitemore), or that private who did the same thing in the same battle, leaving the hospital service to which he had been assigned, (Gould). Nature has been equally tender to the graves of all, and our love knows no distinction.

What a wonderful embalmer is death! We who survive grow daily older. Since the war closed the youngest has gained some new wrinkle, the oldest some added gray hair. A few years more, and only a few tottering figures shall represent the marching files of the Grand Army; a year or two beyond that, and there shall flutter by the window the last empty sleeve. But those who are here are, embalmed forever in our imaginations; they will not change; they never will seem to us less young, less fresh, less daring than when they sallied to their last battle. They will always have the dew of their youth; it is we alone who shall grow old.

And, again, what a wonderful purifier is death! These who fell beside us varied in character; like other men, they had their strength and their weakness, their merits and their faults. Yet now all stains seem washed away; their life ceased at its climax, and the ending sanctified all that went before. They died for their country; that is their record. They found their way to heaven equally short, it seems to us, from every battle-field, and with equal readiness our love seeks them to-day.

I think all of you have learned with me, that as time goes on, the feeling about the war on the part of those who were in it, differs more and more from that of the world at large. To others, that period recedes into mere forgetfulness; to us, it only recedes into a dream. A dream of excitement, of glory, of friendship, of pain—but still a dream. Now we lead a common, perhaps prosaic life again, and the only persons who share that dream with us are the parents and sisters of those who fell; this unites them with us, and though we may be too proud or cold to own it, we walk through life in a light a little different from that of common day.

"What is a victory like?" said a lady to the Duke of Wellington. "The greatest tragedy in the world, madam, except a defeat." Even our great war would be but a tragedy, were it not for the warm feeling of brotherhood it has left behind it, based on the hidden emotions of days like these. The war has given peace to the nation; it has given Union, Freedom, Equal Rights; and in addition to that, it has given to you and me the sacred sympathy of these graves. No matter what it has cost us individually—health or worldly fortunes—it is our reward that we can stand to-day among these graves and yet think that we survive.

My friends, of all the incidents of to-day nothing has touched me so much as what you, perhaps, did not see; a pair of eyes that were looking from one window in Charles street, and saw nothing in all our columns except that name upon our flag. You owe it not alone to the memory of John A. Andrew, but to the memory of his widow, that she may feel that his name is borne by a body of men for whom her husband, looking from Heaven, will have no need to blush. Not a soldier, he was more than a soldier. All of us whom he commissioned or enlisted think of him as our chief; we all belong to his staff. The grandest heroes in history may be those that bear none of the decorations of military service.

The great French soldier, La Tour d'Auvergne, was the hero of many battles, but remained by his own choice in the ranks. Napoleon gave him a sword and the official title, "First among the grenadiers of France." When he was killed, the Emperor ordered that his heart should be entrusted to the keeping of his regiment—that his name should be called at every roll-call, and that his next comrade should make answer, "Dead upon the field of honor." In our memories are the names of many heroes; we treasure all their hearts in this consecrated ground, and when the name of each is called, we answer in flowers, "Dead upon the field of honor."

FREE RELIGION.

[From an article reviewing the Report of the Second Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, and published in the Catholic World for November, 1869.]

The radicals deny that they are destructive, that they have only negations, or that they make war on any existing church, religion, sect or denomination; they will pardon us, then, if we are unable to conceive what they mean by unity, or what unity, except the physical unity of nature, there is or can be among those who divide on every subject in which they feel any interest. Does the Association propose to get rid of diversity by indifference, and of divisions simply by bringing all men to agree to differ? We certainly find only unity in denying among the individuals associated, who agree in nothing except that each one holds himself or herself alone responsible for his or her own personal views and utterances. Some of them would retain the Christian name, and others would reject it. Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot argues that it is not honest to hold on to the name after having rejected the thing. By professing to be a Christian a man binds himself to accept Christianity, and who accepts Christianity binds himself to accept the Catholic Church, which embodies and expresses it. We make an extract from his address:—

"As I look abroad in the community, I see two extreme types of religious faith. One is represented in the Roman Church, the great principle of authority. That Church always has been, and, I think, always will be, the grandest and greatest embodiment of Christianity in social life. It is worthy of profound respect; and I, for one, yield it profound respect. It took an 'infidel,' Auguste Comte, to portray fairly the service done to the world by the Christian Church—the great Catholic Church—of the middle ages; and we radicals are fast to our principles, if we do not do homage to every thing that is great and good and serviceable in its season, even though we think its day of usefulness may have passed. The fundamental principle of the Roman Church is authority,—pure and simple. The theology of Rome carries that principle out to the extreme degree. Its hierarchy embodies it in an institution; and, from beginning to end, from centre to periphery, the Roman Catholic Church is consistent with itself in the development of that one idea in spiritual and social and ecclesiastical life.

At the other pole of human thought and experience, I see a very few persons,—indeed, so few that I might, perhaps, almost count them on the fingers of one hand,—who plant themselves on the principle of liberty alone; who want nothing else; who stand without dogma, without creed, without priesthood, without Bible, without Christ, without anything but the Almighty God working in their hearts. These two principles of authority and freedom have thus worked out for themselves, at last, consistent expression. Here are the two extremes—Romish Christianity and Free Religion; and between these two extremes we see a compromise, Protestant Christianity,—the compromise between Catholicism and Free Religion. Every compromise is weak, because it contains conflicting elements. Protestant Christianity is like the image with head of gold and feet of clay. It can not stand forever. Either Christianity, as embodied in the Roman Church, is right, or else Free Religion is right. Have we not learned yet to give up these combinations of opposites, contraries and incompatibles? Has the war taught us nothing? Are we still trying to make some chimerical mixture, some impossible union of freedom and slavery? I trust not. For my own part, I stand pledged to liberty, pure and simple; and I have come to view all compromises alike, and to cast them utterly away, whether they clothe themselves in the garments of Geneva, or in the last expression of Dr. Bellows and the Unitarian Church." (Pp. 32–33.)

Mr. Abbot is not quite exact in his phraseology, and does not state the Catholic principle correctly. The principle on which the Church rests, and out of which grow all her doctrines and precepts, is not authority, but the mystery of the Incarnation, or the assumption of human nature by the Word. Nor is he himself quite honest according to his own test of honesty. To be consistent with himself, he must reject not only the term Christian, but also the term religion, and put the alternative, either Catholicity or no religion. The word religion—from religare—means either intensively to bind more firmly, or iteratively to bind again, to bind man morally to God as his last end, in addition to his being physically bound to God as his first cause. Free Religion is a contradiction in terms, as much so as free bondage. Religion is always a bond, a law that binds.

HERE is a pithy sermon:—"Our ingress in life is naked and bare; our progress through life is trouble and care; our egress out of it we know not where; but doing well here we shall do well there."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I am glad Mr. Lincoln's views are about to be published; for the clergy, with their usual mendacity, have already begun to address the coming generations, in their 'Sabbath' schools and other places, in phrases conveying the idea that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian, which they take good care to explain as a believer in the Messiahship of Jesus. I do not think it very important about Mr. Lincoln's views myself, (I do not think he had a very deep or radical mind); but history will transmit him to posterity as one of the gods of our generation, and I would that priestcraft, this once, could be prevented from appropriating him to their use. Suffer me to tell you a story. I was born in—, sixty-three years ago. In my boyhood a clergyman (a Covenanter) preached to a congregation of Calvinists of Scotch descent in my neighborhood. He also taught a private academy at his own house; he was a very learned, intolerant, very talented, but very honest man. He edited and published, in addition to his other labors, a weekly paper in which he advocated his religious views. In that paper he contended that ours was an 'infidel' government, inasmuch as the name of Jesus was not recognized, and because 'infidels' could hold office under it. He charged publicly that up to that time all our Presidents had been infidels save the two Adams' and they, he said, were 'Socinians,' which he claimed was as 'damnable' a heresy as infidelity. He charged boldly that all the stories about Washington's Christianity were trumped up by zealots, who believed that the end justified the means. In the winter of 1830 or 1831, this man, James R. Wilson, was Chaplain to the House of Assembly in Albany, N. Y. During that session he published a pamphlet, the object of which was to show that, though Washington was a good and even a praying man, he was no Christian. He did prove this to my satisfaction. He proved it by letters from Ministers of the Gospel who were Washington's cotemporaries, and from conversations he had had with others who knew the man. I remember one letter was from the clergyman who officiated in the church at Alexandria (I believe it was there) which Washington attended. He said the General, so far from being a communicant, as is alleged, never remained in the church when the congregation were partaking of the sacrament. He often urged him, he said, to remain and sanction the ceremony by his presence; but he would not. Mr. Wilson had his office of chaplain taken from him for publishing that book, and that was all the reply it ever got. He died in Pennsylvania, and I do not know if there is a copy of that book in existence. I have written to people in— to have them try to find a copy, but they do not take any interest in it. Pardon my old man's gabble, and believe me, truly yours, etc."

VII. DESCRIPTION OF HADES.

'Mid dreary wastes where silence reigns supreme,
 And gloom profound ne'er knows one cheerful beam,
 Where deadly yews their sombre shadows throw,
 Lies the dark entrance to the realms below.
 Here rolls the Styx his black and sluggish tide,
 Exhaling vapors from his bosom wide;
 In spectral crowds, along the dismal shore,
 The restless ghosts in troops and armies pour,
 Whom weeping friends with funeral rites have blessed,
 The last kind office which their hearts suggest.
 Paleness and Winter, with an equal sway,
 Reign o'er vast wilds, shut out from light of day.
 In fruitless search, the shadowy phantoms roam,
 To reach the city and the towering dome
 Where, throned supreme, the gloomy Pluto reigns,
 The awful monarch of these dark domains.
 A thousand frowning gates throw open wide
 Their massive folds and yawn on every side;
 And as all rivers to the ocean tend,
 The tribes of earth their countless myriads send
 To swell the throng within this vast abode,
 Which like the boundless sea is ne'er o'erflowed.
 The bloodless spectres in the forum stray,
 Affect the labors of their mortal day,
 Frequent the palace of the infernal king,
 Ply each his trade, and each his tribute bring,— Essaying to revive, with vain regret,
 The joys they've lost, but never can forget.

The Index.

JUNE 11, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted, and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

In reprinting Essays which were formerly read as sermons in Christian pulpits, we sometimes make a few verbal changes, omit a text, or prefix an appropriate motto. But the essential thought is left as when first spoken,—even when we should now make it otherwise.

Before making a reply to Mr. Wasson's article in the May Radical, entitled—"Mr. Abbot's Religion,"—we shall wait until after the publication of the Report of the late meeting of the Free Religious Association. Mr. Wasson's Essay, read at that Convention, bore upon the same general subject, and ought, in fairness to him, to be considered in connection with it.

The Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston May 26 and 27, was largely attended. A full report of it will be printed before long in pamphlet form, and a condensed report is given to-day in THE INDEX, in the "Department of the Free Religious Association," by Rev. W. J. Potter, our highly valued friend and co-editor. There will be no need, therefore, on our part, of attempting any account of the proceedings. The result of the Convention was in the highest degree encouraging, and furnishes fresh proof, if any were needed, that the public mind is rapidly awakening to the importance of the movement represented by this Association. The size and attentiveness of the three successive audiences were significant. A friend suggests that Rev. W. H. Channing could do signal service to humanity by repeating his admirable address on the Chinese religions throughout the West, and thus prepare the way for the millions soon to come from the greatest empire of the East.

THE "CATHOLIC WORLD" ON FREE RELIGION.

In another column we print a criticism on our speech at the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, in Boston, last year. It is taken from the Catholic World, the monthly magazine published by Father Hecker in New York city; and we surmise it to have been written by Father Hecker himself.

But whether our surmise is correct or not, the critic seems unable to conceive of a religious unity among men not based on special beliefs or dogmas. This scepticism concerning the possibility of a religious union on broader grounds than mere opinion, is characteristic of all branches of the Christian Church, from the Catholics down to the Unitarians, although it decreases in intensity in proportion as orthodoxy loses its hold on the human mind. To a consistent Christian, especially to a consistent Catholic, the idea of a religious fellowship not based on definite articles of faith is supremely ridiculous. Creed is the corner-stone of organized Christianity; and if Christians could really conceive of any other corner-stone, they would soon cease to be Christians. But the world is far wiser than the Church in this point, as in so many others. When men form a banking corporation, or an insurance company, or a business association of any sort, they simply announce their PRACTICAL OBJECT, and admit as members all who will PRACTICALLY AID in carrying out this object. They institute no inquiry into beliefs of any kind, but take it for granted that whoever comes forward to help has all the beliefs necessary or desirable. Religious associations should do the same. Let the objects be specified, and all else omitted. There is an actual power of attraction in a common object far mightier than that of a common opinion. Take for instance a scientific association. There we find no catechizing of members to discover their scientific creed, although science has its schools quite as antagonistic as those of religion; but the pursuit of science is an object large enough and real enough to enlist the active support and co-operation of all the schools. Now the Free Religious Association follows the ordinary plan of secular life; it proposes its objects, and asks no questions as to the creeds of those who feel enough interest in the objects to come and help in carrying them out. The method of the Catholic Church is that of Christianity; the method of the Free Religious Association is that of common sense.

Our critic makes two points against our speech,—that "the principle on which the Church rests, and out of which grow all her doctrines and precepts, is not authority, but the mystery of the Incarnation,"—and that, in order to be consistent and honest, we must give up the word religion as well as the word Christianity.

To the first point we reply, that we feel a certain delicacy in undertaking to instruct Father Hecker in the principles of his own Church, but that really we find ourself under the painful necessity of doing so. The "mystery of the Incarnation," on which he says the Church rests, is a dogma of the Church itself,—a dogma which is an infinite insult to human reason. How are we to know that it is true? What is the warrant for it? Father Hecker can only answer that the Church says it is true,—that men must accept it for this reason, or else incur the condemnation of God. With all due respect, therefore, for Father Hecker, we insist either that he does not know, or else that he prefers to conceal, the real foundation of his own Church. The "Incarnation" is not that foundation, but the principle of blind submission to authority is; and the Church would commit suicide to allow human reason freely to accept or reject that dogma.

The other point, that religion is a bondage (being derived from religare, to bind), and cannot call itself free without self-contradiction, is as weak as the first. Cicero himself derives the word from relegere, to traverse again or carefully review; and he is nearly as good a judge of Latin etymology as Father Hecker. But we do not propose to rest the case on any etymology. Religion is a fact of human nature, of human history, of human experience; and its true definition must come from scientific and philosophical study. The result of our own careful study of this great fact is, that religion is humanity's conscious struggle for self-development, its effort to achieve the ideal perfection of its own being; and that this struggle or effort becomes successful in proportion as it is earnest, persevering, and free. The only "bondage" in religion, thus interpreted, is the obligation of every soul to be true to itself, to the law of its own universal nature, in thought, word, and act; and this is impossible except in freedom.

As to our "honesty," Father Hecker is welcome to his opinion; it is our business to be honest, not to be thought so.

REASONS WHY.

The following note was published in The Independent of May 26 :—

TOLEDO, O., May 19, 1870.

Editor Independent :

DEAR SIR:—In your paper of this date, I see my name mentioned as member of a Committee, appointed by the Union Woman Suffrage Association "to attend the Annual Meeting of the American Woman Suffrage Association, in November, in order to effect a union of the two societies." Not being a member of either Association, I must ask leave very respectfully to decline the service; and you will oblige me by printing this note in your columns. But I shall rejoice if the existing Associations can be united on a perfectly just and equitable basis, and trust that, whether united or single, they may speedily accomplish the reform to which they are devoted.

Very truly yours,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The reason given above for declining to act on the Committee is a sufficient one. We are not a member of either association; and for the present, at least, we intend to work in the cause of woman's enfranchisement independently of all organizations. But even if we had been a member of the "Union Woman Suffrage Association," we could not act with this Committee. The method adopted for bringing about a junction of forces in the woman movement does not commend itself to us either as impartial or as quite generous. This Committee must go to the "American" Association, and coolly invite it to disband for the purpose of joining what is really the "National" Association, which has only changed its name and officers. Such a junction would not be on equal terms. It would be the sacrifice of one Association to the other, not a free union of both; and the "American" has just as much right to complain now as the "National" had before,—we think more. Nothing will come of the Committee's proposal, and nothing ought to come of it. Certainly, we could not join in making it.

The case stands just as it stood. Two Associations exist, neither being in fact what they both claim to be in form,—national, i. e. representative of the entire party of workers for woman suffrage. If these two Associations can be fairly and equitably united, we believe that the cause of woman would be greatly strengthened, since the local and personal division now too painfully apparent operates in countless ways to retard the progress of the reform. Only the plan which we proposed a few weeks ago (modified, perhaps, in some particulars) can ever be the basis of a just union. Union may not soon come; it will at least have to wait, until each organization can make up its mind to yield exactly as much as it demands. But we think the public interest requires a concentration of effort which can only be secured by unity of purpose, plan, and action. However long postponed, this concentration will become more and more necessary; and it is only defeated by the division now existing.

GOD AND NATURE.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., March 8, 1870.

Mr. F. E. Abbot:

DEAR SIR:—I have now been reading (except No. 1, not received) all the numbers of THE INDEX; and although I do not believe, and cannot view all things, as you do, I nevertheless like your paper very much; for I rejoice at every progress, every liberal step forward, believing, as I do, that the improvement and consequent happiness of the human family will be in proportion as it becomes liberal and advanced. It would, then, only be a truism to say, that I wish "God-speed" to the Free Religious Association and movement!

As decidedly the best part of THE INDEX, I consider your very able lectures, which I read with as much pleasure as interest. And yet, as I said above, I do not believe, and do not view all things, as you do. This was the case when I read your lecture, fine as it is, on "The Miracle Question" in the last number (10) of THE INDEX, in which you adopt Spinoza's pantheistic idea of God. I readily admit that this conception of God is infinitely better than the Bible or orthodox idea of him; yet I cannot admit the correctness of even that conception of God, so long as I must agree with Mr. Herbert Spencer (Ultimate Religious Ideas) that the "Power which the universe manifests is utterly inscrutable."

Believing this to be an irrefutable truth, we cannot possibly know anything of God; and being thus utterly ignorant of him, or his essence, I can neither believe in his existence at all, nor can I maintain his non-existence; for I can not know either. I may have more reasons, stronger arguments for this belief or disbelief; but I can neither, as Spinoza and you do, positively assert the existence of God, nor deny it. Neither can I see that it makes any great difference whether I believe in him, or not,—whether he exists distinct from Nature, or whether he and Nature are identical. If there is a God, he must necessarily be an intelligent, yea, the most perfectly intelligent Being,—must govern us, the universe, all Nature, and all events in them; for if he does not,—if he leaves Nature, and all in it, to itself,—then it is just the same as if there were no God. Nature, acting by necessity, and according to her own fixed laws, does not act with intelligence. What, then, is the part of God in her. Supervision? Providence? But her laws are fixed; there is no need of supervision; because she and they need no tinkering. "Whatever events occur in Nature," you very truly and correctly say, "they must be natural" (i. e. not according to a "supervisor," but according to her own laws); but far less truly and correctly you go on to say, "they must, therefore, (?) be Divine (?); for Nature is nothing but the activity of God." Where, then, is the postulate for your "therefore?" I can't see it; I should rather say, "Nature, in all things and always, acts naturally (i. e. in conformity to her laws); therefore, there is no need of any other agent, of any God." If you were an "Orthodox" or Paley, you might, it is true, ask me, "Wherefrom your laws?" I know I could not answer this question any more satisfactorily than you could, if I should ask you in return, "Wherefrom your God?" You may answer me, "God is uncreated; he is from all eternity;" and that would be just what I maintain of Nature and her laws. In that sense God and Nature are identical. But that does not answer the question as I, and I believe you, too, understand it, "Who and what is God?" It only verifies Mr. Spencer's saying, "The Power which the Universe manifests is utterly inscrutable." If God is at all, he must be an Independent Intelligence, not in, but above, and distinct from, Nature; and being thus, he is—a superfluity; for Nature can very well get along without him. And saying that God and Nature are identical would be only a dodge, to cover up the fact of his non-existence, the fact that Nature is the one and all,—a dodge which I think much too well of you, and respect your outspoken manliness much too highly, to believe you capable of using.

Very respectfully yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

[Although long delayed by our hope of making a full reply, the above ought to be printed. We can only say a very few words, after all.]

1. We "adopt" nobody's idea of God, having one of our own. Neither Spinoza nor Herbert Spencer has adequately expressed it.

2. Mr. Einstein agrees with Mr. Spencer that "the Power which the Universe manifests is utterly inscrutable." On the contrary, we should say that, if this Power were wholly inscrutable, the universe would not manifest it at all. The supposition that it manifests itself destroys the supposition that it is utterly inscrutable. Mr. Spencer's statement is self-contradictory.

3. We know just so much of God as the universe "manifests"—no more and no less. The great Power of the universe, according to Mr. Einstein himself, is manifested, that is, made known to some extent. It is, therefore, inconsistent to deny all human knowledge of it.

4. Mr. Einstein holds that Nature, because acting by fixed, necessary laws, "does not act with intelligence." But would it be intelligent to act otherwise,—by irregular caprice? The only unanswerable disproof of God would be the proof of lawlessness in Nature. So long as Nature is an intelligible whole, a unit in virtue of all-embracing and never-changing law, so long shall we be mentally necessitated to recognize in law the highest conceivable proof of intelligence in the universe.

5. The question is, not whether there is some "other agent" than Nature, but whether Nature's admitted harmony and invariability of action is not the only conceivable demonstration of an absolute Intelligence. Whoever grants the intelligible unity of the universe, grants the premise from which follows the intelligence of its cause.

6. Mr. Einstein does us no more than justice in supposing us incapable of a "dodge." We would in turn thank him for frankly stating his own convictions on this subject in our columns. They are entitled to as much respect as the most orthodox views; and we invite a further explanation or defence of them.—ED.]

WAS WASHINGTON A CHRISTIAN.

MR. EDITOR.—I see some of the righteous friends of Mr. Lincoln seem to be scandalized at the idea that he was an infidel. What about Washington's belief in Christianity? It appears to me, if a belief in Christianity is essential to salvation, nearly all of our best men are gone to Hell,—what an idea! Let the Watchman and Reflector chew the cud over this awhile:—

WASHINGTON'S RELIGION.—In the works of Jefferson. (vol. iv, p. 512.) we find the following extract from his journal of Feb. 1, 1800:

"Doctor Rush told me that he had it from Asa Green, that when the clergy addressed Gen. Washington on his departure from the Government, it was observed in their consultation that he had never, on any occasion, said a word to the public which showed a belief in the Christian religion, and they thought they should so pen their address as to force him at length to declare publicly whether he was a Christian or not. They did so. However, he observed, the old fox was too cunning for them. He answered every article of their address particularly, except that, which he passed over without notice. Rush observes, he never did say a word on the subject in any of his public papers, except in his valedictory letter to the Governors of the States, when he resigned his commission in the army, wherein he speaks of 'the benign influence of the Christian religion.'"

"I know that Governor Morris, who pretended to be in his secrets, and believed himself to be so, has often told me, that General Washington believed no more of that system than he himself did."

[Curious testimony in the same direction will be found in our column of "Voices from the People."—ED.]

THE RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF THE FAMOUS HINDU REFORMER.

MR. EDITOR.—In justice to Keshub Chunder Sen, as also in justice to Christianity, will you please, in addition to what you printed last week, publish also the following statement in regard to the reformer's estimate of Christianity? Though he thinks that the Hindus should be left alone in the use of it, he nevertheless bears unequivocal testimony in favor of the Bible. He has said that India cannot get on without the Bible. It is, according to his own confession, immeasurably superior to their own Sacred Books. The product of the Hindu mind in this direction is not of a character to admit of extended use in the moral elevation and spiritual development of that race.

"Perhaps you will ask me, 'What is the attitude you assume towards Christianity—towards Christ? What is the great religious future of India? Do you accord an affectionate and brotherly welcome to missionaries of Christ, or do you look upon them with feelings of abhorrence and hatred?' I for one must say that it is impossible for a true Theist, whether Indian or European, to cherish in his mind feelings of antipathy or aversion towards Christ or his disciples. That is literally impossible. There are thousands in India, I know, and many of these men I number amongst my own friends, who do not like to see Christ preached to the population of India. Christianity has come to us in a foreign and repulsive form. Christianity in its founder, in its earliest traditions, in its earliest laborers, was Oriental, Asiatic; and there is no reason why Christianity should in the present day be presented to the Indian population in any other than an Oriental and Asiatic aspect. Leave us to ourselves, and let us study the Bible. Do we not find these images and precepts of a very Asiatic and Oriental stamp? Do we not find that there is much in these descriptions with which we are bound as Indians to sympathize? Do we not feel that the spirit of Christianity comes to us as something very natural, native to our heart, something which by the very constitution of our peculiarly Indian mind we are bound to sympathize? In that spirit Christianity shall be accepted by India. There may be thousands among my countrymen who deny that, but I for one, so long as I live, shall continue to say that the spirit of Christ India will one day receive."

CHEERFUL STRAINS.

BOSTON, May 29, 1870,
30 COURT ST.

Ed. Index:

DEAR SIR,—Rev. W. H. H. Murray and some others assert substantially that the Hell-Fire doctrines are no part of the orthodoxy of to-day. I find in the "Songs for Social and Public Worship. Revised edition, 1864. Rev. Ed. N. Kirk, D. D.,"—a hymn book in use in the Orthodox Church in Ashburton Place, Boston, over which Rev. Dr. Kirk now presides,—the following honest verification of Dr. Watts, prefaced by the invitation—"Oh! come, let us sing unto the Lord":

My thoughts on awful subjects roll,—
Damnation and the dead;
What horrors seize the guilty soul
Upon a dying bed!

Lingering about these mortal shores,
She makes a long delay,
Till, like a flood with rapid force,
Death sweeps the wretch away.

Then swift and dreadful she descends
Down to the fiery coast,
Amongst abominable fiends,
Herself a frightened ghost.

There endless crowds of sinners lie,
And darkness makes their chains;
Tortured with keen despair they cry,
Yet wait for fiercer pains.

Not all their anguish nor their blood
For their old guilt atones;
Nor the compassion of a God
Shall hearken to their groans.

Amazing grace, that kept my breath
Nor bade my soul remove,
Till I had learned my Saviour's death,
And well insured his love!

I submit this without comment. Put on a black frock, a white choker, and a pair of spectacles, and proclaim it from a high pulpit in a loud, vibrant, nasal tone with sounding-board to back you,—and how it would scare the sinners!

Yours truly,

H. H.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Carl H. Horsch addressed, in the INDEX of May 7, five pertinent questions—"To those ministers who claim the name 'Christian,' and do not believe in Jesus the Christ."

Supposing that I am one of the class he intended to designate, I venture to reply:—

1. It would be inconsistent for us to call ourselves, or allow ourselves to be called, Christian ministers, if we did not in some sense believe in the Messiahship of Jesus. We believe, with Lowell, "God sends his teachers unto every age," and among these teachers of the ages, sent by God, we recognize Jesus of Nazareth as the Chief—"primus inter pares." We know very well that not a single Christian sect or denomination, as such, has ever accepted this view of Jesus' Messiahship. The great majority of professing Christians would undoubtedly say, "that is not to believe in Jesus the Christ, and with this belief only you have no business to call yourselves Christian." So they would say also that we are not religious, but infidel. We are not religious in their sense, but we put our own construction on the word, and continue to call ourselves religionists. Mr. Abbot does, Mr. Horsch, I presume, does; then why not "Christian" in the same way?

2. A good republican, opposing one who declared that "Cotton is King," might say, "No, Reason is King," or "Freedom is King," and honestly declare himself a loyal subject. Why not? properly, as well as honestly?

3. I can "do more good" to retain the name Christian than to drop it, because, with the prefixes of "Radical" or "Rationalist" which I am careful to use, I think my true position is more likely to be understood than if I were to take the name "Infidel." The name "Theist" I do not object to; but my idea of God is so very different from that of the popular theology, that, if I have no right to be considered a believer in Jesus because I do not accept the dogma of supernatural birth and mission, I do not see that, by the same rule, I have any right to call myself a Theist—a believer in God. Christianity is coming to stand more and more for the simple law of love to God and man, and less and less for any dogma or ceremony. Jesus, I think, intended this. Men everywhere are opening their eyes to the fact that the spirit of Jesus, and of all true Christianity or Messiahship, is the spirit of truth and love and liberty—no more, no less. We want to help on that idea. The great question is one of ideas—not of names, or persons. As soon as my good friend Abbot succeeds in proving to my satisfaction that this, our mutual aim, can be better accomplished by giving up the name Christian, I, for one, shall be ready to take my stand with him "squarely outside of Christianity;" and then if my good friend Seaver, of the "Investigator," will prove to me that I can do more for that which I now call the Christ-idea, by dropping the names God and Religion, as well as Christ and Christianity, I shall not hesitate a moment to follow Ellis of "the Broad-gauge Church," and fling boldly out the Atheistic banner. Mr. Horsch wrongs us if he supposes us fetish-worshippers in any sense.

4. I believe that there is "much goodness and truth" outside the nominally Christian Church—perhaps more than in.

5. We have no "struggle with the churches for a mere name." That were indeed a foolish contest. All we insist on is our free and rational ideas. Let them call us what they please. J. L. HATCH.

IS CHRISTIANITY ABSOLUTE RELIGION?

BY THOS. M'CLINTOCK.

F. E. Abbot:

ESTEEMED FRIEND:—I have read with much interest thy Fifty Affirmations and the discourses in which they are applied and amplified, and have found much to admire and approve, while in the positions assumed I find several, which I deem quite important, from which I feel obliged to dissent. I will endeavor to present the points of difference between us with as much perspicuity as possible, that it may be seen in what our views coalesce and in what they diverge. Regarding the great essentials of true, absolute Religion, its characteristics and beneficent results, I apprehend we are perfectly agreed. My mind for many years, perhaps thirty or more, has been settled and clear, that it did not originate with Jesus, nor Paul, nor Peter, nor John, nor any man that ever lived; though Jesus, by his divinely spiritual and beautiful life and his sublimely magnanimous death, gave a mighty impetus to its progress, and no doubt the others named, in their several and various measures, helped to increase the swelling wave. And as no man founded the one true and ever-enduring Religion, so its authority rests not on any Book or collection of books in the world. Its basis is THE DIVINE AND HUMAN NATURES. It is, therefore, old as God, the eternal Fountain whence it emanates, and co-eval with man, the conscious intelligent subject of it.

The question then comes—Is Christianity or the Christ-doctrine, as taught by Jesus and Paul, (the two ablest expounders of it in their day,) the true, absolute Religion? I think it is. In confirmation of this predicate, I will now state the evidences, which, to my mind, amply sustain it. If higher evidences invalidate the reasons I present, then I go with thee. For I am prepared to say with Theodore Parker, "if Christianity is not the absolute religion, then we need something better." But if, on the contrary, my views are borne out by the doctrine both of Jesus and Paul, legitimately and fairly applied, then I hope to have thy company. Should, however, the historic evidence outweigh in thy mind the more interior and graphic principles and doctrines inculcated by Jesus and recognized by Paul, I feel sure that, however we may differ as to the letter of the history, in spirit we shall still be agreed. But I will hasten to the matter in hand.

I begin with the origin and primitive meaning of the term "Messiah" or "Christ." The first, which is Hebrew, the second Greek, mean simply in English "Anointed;" or, both words in the two former languages being substantives, the exact meaning in English, rendered substantively, would be "Anointed One." It grew out of the custom which obtained among the Hebrews, of anointing with fragrant oil their kings and high priests, and sometimes prophets, on being installed into office. The term, therefore, in its origin and use, was purely incidental and local, and not necessary to express any property in spiritual or physical nature beyond the simple fact of anointing with oil. It was not necessary to express any attribute or perfection of the Divine nature, nor the relations which exist between the Divine and human natures, nor the action of the Infinite Divine on the finite human,—and is not now necessary. If it were blotted out of every vocabulary, God would be the same, man would be the same, his immortal destiny the same; Religion, as Divinely ordained, would be the same—unimpaired—the means of uniting man with God, now and forever.

Those on whom the ceremony of anointing was performed, were entitled to certain immunities and were regarded by the Israelites with religious reverence, and the oil itself was regarded as holy. But, like their Tabernacle and its appendages, erected in the wilderness as the nucleus of a ceremonial religion, the holiness was but factitious and nominal. This structure, correctly designated, in the epistle to the Hebrews "a worldly sanctuary," had its holy places, holy priests, with their holy garments, holy plate of gold on Aaron's forehead, holy altars, holy table, holy candlestick, holy laver, holy anointing oil, &c.—of all which the holiness was merely legal, prescriptive, ceremonial,—no real holiness in any of them, nor power for the production of any. But this "anointing" was a potent ceremony with the Hebrews. The subjects of it were the "Lord's anointed" (Messiahs); and as these were pre-eminently distinguished and set apart to a particular work in their assumed theocracy, the epithet came to be applied likewise to others on whom no oil had been literally poured. Thus it is appropriated by one of their prophets to Cyrus, the Persian monarch, in anticipation of the services he offered to render the Jews, in their suffering condition under the Chaldeans: "Thus said Jehovah to his 'anointed' (Messiah), to Cyrus, whom I hold by the right hand, &c." (Isaiah, XLV.) "He whom Jehovah loveth will execute his pleasure upon Babylon, and his power upon the Chaldeans." (XLVIII. See De Wette, Introduc. to Old Test. Vol. 2, p. 364, &c.) The term is also applied in the Hebrew scripture to the whole Jewish nation, as being, in the apprehension of that bigoted and narrow-minded people, the peculiar favorites of Heaven. In coming down to New Testament times, the word essentially changes its meaning, from the external and ceremonial to the spiritual and practical; and this latter is the characteristic of chief importance in our present investigation.

And at this point let me say, that this great change we primarily owe to Jesus, who was the first to inaugurate the idea of a spiritual Messiah or Christ, and in the establishment of this idea he laid the fundamental principle of ABSOLUTE RELIGION—as I hope in the sequel satisfactorily to show. Next to Jesus, for lucid illustration of the principle, we are indebted, I think, to Paul, more than any other of the apostles. The change of which I have spoken was indeed a momentous one; a change which not only lies at the foundation of true Christianity and all true religion, but which in its natural and inevitable results abrogates the whole Mosaic code—its worship, its rituals, including its sacrifices and offerings, its statutes—except whatever in the latter was really moral, that is, which comprised some inherent principle of ABSOLUTE MORALITY. Verifying the aphorism of Jesus, "Every plant which is not of my Heavenly Father's planting shall be rooted up." It might be interesting here to give a condensed view of the distinguishing characteristics of the law and the Gospel. But as to do so would extend this article to an unreasonable length, I will defer that point till we come to the examinations of Paul's views of the Christ-doctrine, and will proceed immediately to the wants in the history of the Israelites which, in the providence of God, led to the great change indicated, and the important results which followed.

DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION.

We are able this week to give some account of the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, which was held in Boston on the 26th and 27th of May. As heretofore, the proceedings are to be published complete in pamphlet-form. We shall here therefore only give a sketch of what was done.

The Business Meeting was held as advertised on Thursday, May 26th, at Parker Fraternity Hall. The attendance at this meeting was very much larger than it has been in previous years, and the interest manifested by the discussion which followed the reading of the Report of the Executive Committee was very encouraging to the officers of the Association. The meeting was called to order by the President, Octavius B. Frothingham, at a little past 3 o'clock. The record of the last annual meeting was read by the Secretary. The Treasurer then read his report, which showed that all expenses for the year had been met, and that a prudent balance remained in the Treasury. The Committee on the nomination of officers for the ensuing year reported the same list of names as last year, with the exception of Thos. W. Higginson as Vice-President in place of Mrs. C. M. Severance, who, on account of her many duties in other directions, had requested to be excused from further service. Some protest was pleasantly made against diminishing the number of women on the Executive Committee, but the list of officers was elected as reported. The Secretary then read the Report of the Executive Committee for the year.

We shall print this next week entire, and so will not further allude to it now. After the reading of the Report, Mr. F. E. Abbot offered a resolution for the purpose of clearly stating that THE INDEX is not the organ of the Free Religious Association, and that the Association is not responsible for anything that appears in its columns, excepting in the Department specially devoted to the interests of the Association. After some discussion it was decided that it was sufficient specifically to refer to and endorse what was said on this point in the Report of the Executive Committee;—namely, that in the arrangement made between the editor of THE INDEX and the Executive Committee of the Association, it is distinctly understood that no responsibility rests upon either party for the work of the other in THE INDEX. A resolution was also introduced and unanimously adopted, recommending the Executive Committee to consider the practicability of holding, between now and the next annual meeting, four public conventions in different parts of the country outside of Boston. There seemed to be a very general desire manifested on the part of those present that this work of Conventions should be extended. Not only did our Western friends who were present support the proposition, but the New England and Boston members also. With the adoption of this resolution, the meeting adjourned, to come together again the next day in the general Convention in Tremont Temple.

The Tremont Temple meeting, of Friday, brought together a grand concourse of people. Not only was the attendance large, but the quality of the audience during all the three sessions was especially noteworthy. It was an assembly of thinking people. No attempt was made to present anything sensational, anything to attract and hold a miscellaneous crowd. The selected speakers were thinkers and writers rather than orators; and they were asked to present their best and most carefully prepared thought. Most of them came, therefore, with elaborately prepared papers, which they read, and no one of them appears to have trusted to purely extemporaneous utterance. Their statements and words were carefully weighed. Now such a meeting is a tremendous strain upon an audience. Our own judgment is that we attempted too much, and that if we had thrown in something a little more lively and extempore for occasional relief, it might have been better. But the audience stood the strain wonderfully. The really best things that the speakers said were the things that were applauded. All the speakers testified to that. They felt that they were addressing people of thought and culture and independent judgment, who demanded the best they had to give, and who did not come there merely to be tickled with fine oratory and pretty stories.

The morning session was opened with an elaborate and brilliant address by Mr. Frothingham, the President, giving his idea of the general principles and aims of the Free Religious Association. We have heard but one voice as to the power and fairness and comprehensiveness of this address,—the voice of admiration and approval. But as it will be published in full in the pamphlet report of the meeting, we shall not attempt to give any further idea of it here. All who desire can see it before long in the pamphlet, and can then judge it for themselves. For the same reason we shall not give here any abstract of the other essays and speeches. They will all be printed in full. We shall simply mention now their topics.

Mr. Frothingham was followed by Mr. D. A. Wasson, in a paper setting forth the philosophical place of Religion among the great powers of the human mind; by Mrs. D. E. Cheney with an address on Religion as a Social Force in relation to Philanthropy and Reform; and by Mr. F. E. Abbot, on the Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age. All these addresses, so various in their subject-matter, were carefully thought out, and were well received by the audience. Mr. John Weiss, who was to have spoken on what Religion should be in America, was unfortunately ill and unable to be at the meeting. The allotted time, however, was all taken by the other speakers, and the meeting continued till after one o'clock.

The afternoon session, as had been advertised, was devoted to the consideration of the question of Religion in the Public Schools. The subject was opened by an address from Mr. Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, who dwelt mainly on the greater question behind that advertised,—the relation of Religion to the State,—taking the ground that the utter separation of Church and State, which was the American theory of government, must lead logically and practically to the absolute secularization of the public schools. A general discussion followed, in which all the speakers save one took substantially the same ground though not all coming to it in the same way. Among the speakers were the venerable Loretta Mott, now nearly eighty years old, Mrs. U. Tracy Cutler, of Ohio (who spoke as a representative of Orthodoxy, and yet favored the exclusion of the Bible from the schools), Rev. Rowland Connor, of Boston, J. Stillman, Esq., of Rhode Island, J. L. Russell and J. L. Hatch, of Massachusetts, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, of Cincinnati, and S. T. Calthrop, of Syracuse, N. Y. The speaker who opposed the movement to exclude the reading of the Bible as a religious exercise in the public schools, was Mr. Gustave Watson, of Boston. We feel free to say that the discussion on this subject was not so weighty as we hoped it would be; it was lively and interesting, but did not bring out all the features of the momentous subject. The subject, however, will hold over till another year, and probably for many years to come.

The evening session was opened by a thoughtful and comprehensive Essay on the "Natural Sympathy and Unity of Religions," from Samuel Johnson, of the Free Church in Lynn. The topic was followed up by Rabbi I. M. Wise, who traced the development of the elemental religious ideas in Judaism, and argued that Judaism was a progressive revelation of Truth, taking Reason for its authority; by T. W. Higginson, who spoke of the past and present merits of Mohammedanism; and by Wm. H. Channing, who illustrated the riches of the religion of the Chinese, and spoke of the benefit that might come to American civilization by a just and generous reception of the Chinese in this country. The Secretary read a portion of a letter, which has already been published in THE INDEX, from Babu Behary Mullic, of the Brahmo Somaj in India, and announced that the present great representative man of the Brahmo Somaj, Keshub Chunder Sen, who is now in London, would probably come to this country in the course of the year, and that the Free Religious Association must hold itself ready to give him a fraternal welcome. The President then said that with this benediction from the land of the Brahmins the Convention would adjourn.

Thus ended the Third Annual Meeting. The general feeling appears to be that it has been a gain on preceding meetings, especially in the fact that the principles which the Free Religious Association represents now stand forth more clearly defined to the world.

Beautiful Women!

All women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty? Women know, too, that when men speak of the intellect of women, they speak critically, tamely, coolly; but when they come to speak of the charms of a beautiful woman, their language and their eyes kindle with an enthusiasm which shows them to be profoundly, if not, indeed, ridiculously in earnest. It is part of the natural sagacity of women to perceive all this, and therefore employ every allowable art to become the goddess of that adoration. Preach to the contrary, as we may, against the arts employed by women for enhancing their beauty, there still stands the eternal fact, that the world does not prefer the society of an ugly woman of genius to that of a beauty of less intellectual acquirements. The world has yet allowed no higher mission to woman than to be beautiful, and it would seem that the ladies of the present age are carrying this idea of the world to greater extremes than ever, for all women now to whom nature has denied the talismanic power of beauty, supply the deficiency by the use of a most delightful toilet article, known as the "Bloom of Youth," which has been lately introduced into this country by GEORGE W. LAIRD, a delicate beautifier, which smooths out all indentations, furrows, scars; removing tan, freckles, and discolorations from the skin, leaving the complexion clear, brilliant, and beautiful, the skin soft and smooth. With the assistance of this new American trick of a Lady's toilet, female beauty is destined to play a larger part in the admiration of men and the ambition of women than all the arts employed since her creation. Prof. C. F. Chandler, Chemist to the Metropolitan Board of Health, has recently prepared a chemical analysis of this delightful toilet preparation, and reported that the "Bloom of Youth" was harmless, containing nothing injurious to the health. Ladies need have no fear of using this invaluable toilet acquisition.

BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

WHAT IS TRUTH?

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, May 15, 1870.]

"The old question with which people sought to push logicians into a corner, so that they must either have recourse to pitiful sophisms, or confess their ignorance and consequently the vanity of their whole art, is this,—What is truth?"
KANT, Critique of Pure Reason, p. 50.

"Pilate saith unto him, 'What is truth?' And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, 'I find in him no fault at all.'"
FOURTH GOSPEL, XVII, 38.

"What is truth?" said jesting Pilate; and would not stay for an answer."
LORD BACON, Essays, Of Truth.

"Truth for Authority,—not Authority for Truth."
LUCRETIA MOTT.

In the fourth gospel, which in my opinion ranks very high, not only as a work of art, but also as a philosophically developed expression of the "Christian consciousness" which was gradually created by the Christ-Idea under the controlling influence of Greek thought, there is no passage more impressive or strikingly dramatic than the account of the interview between Jesus and Pilate. To Pilate's question, "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Jesus at first answers evasively by putting a counter-question as to the source of this implied accusation of treason against Caesar; but when Pilate repeats the inquiry, he boldly asserts his own royalty as one whose kingdom is "not of this world" (i. e. not of the existing order of things, which was to be followed, however, by the Messiah's reign on earth); and he then adds these memorable words,—"To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." He thus, to quote the striking phrase of Hase, declares himself to be "the King of Truth." The exclamation of Pilate—"What is truth?" is commonly supposed by Christian readers to be a reverent inquiry as to the nature of truth, and to show that Pilate was deeply impressed by the august bearing and spiritual majesty of his prisoner. Sir William Hamilton apparently takes it in this serious sense:—"The question, What is Truth? is an old and celebrated problem. It was proposed by the Roman Governor—by Pontius Pilate—to our Savior; and it is a question which still recurs, and is still keenly agitated in the most recent schools of Philosophy." [Lectures on Logic, p. 378.] But I conceive its meaning quite otherwise. When Jesus replies to Pilate, who only wished to know whether he was dealing with a rebel to his own imperial master, a dangerous pretender to the Jewish throne,—"I am not a king of this world; I am the king of truth,"—Pilate exclaims contemptuously,—

"King of truth! pshaw, king of moonshine. What's truth to me?" and, without waiting a reply, goes to the Jews to say in effect that he has found Jesus to be merely a crack-brained and harmless enthusiast, wholly undeserving of execution as a traitor. The hard, practical Roman, who knew no truth but that of the sword, and believed in no monarchy but that of military force, despised his captive, and would set him free as one powerless for mischief,—too insignificant to be feared. The man of action, as usual, saw only a weakling in the man of ideas; the realist turned away scornfully from the idealist, and laughed at the notion that anybody should bother his head about truth! It was the old story which is never finished in the telling, because the so-called practical men of this world are commonly blind as bats to the enormous power of ideas. But Pilate's "jesting" inquiry, to which he would not even "stay for an answer," namely, "What is truth?" has in all ages been the subject of profoundest and most anxious thought. It therefore pleased me greatly that one of your number should propose this inquiry to me as the subject of some of my Sunday essays; and I trust we shall see more meaning in it than Pilate saw.

The word truth is so common in men's mouths, that it may seem superfluous seriously to ask—"What is truth?" What all men talk about, all men, surely, must understand. Alas, not so! Perhaps no word in the English language is so much abused as this little word truth. It stands to each man as the sum-total of his own notions, or the notions of some little party or sect in which he has merged himself. To a Mohammedan, the "truth" is Mohammedanism; to a Christian, it is Christianity; to a fool, it is his own folly. It seldom occurs to the average mind that truth is too vast to be comprehended in any human system. Every class of men has its own peculiar cant; there is sometimes, I am sorry to say, cant to be heard even in the anti-cant party. I have noticed that, in the special cant of reform, truth with a big T plays a very important part. We are all in danger of getting into the habit of using words without thought; and I suppose that cant is, in most cases, nothing but words thoughtlessly used, in obedience to mere habit or fashion. If words are used for purposes of deception, they deserve a harsher name than that of cant. With the hope, therefore, that we may all avoid the danger of using this word truth in a canting manner, and attain a larger conception of what it stands for, let us see what answer we can find to Pilate's question.

Truth is of three kinds,—that is, the word truth has three fundamentally distinct meanings.

1. There is the truth of Being or of Things. By this I mean the realities of the universe, wholly independent of all thought concerning them. Whether we think correctly or incorrectly, the facts of existence remain the same. I may think the moon to be only as big as a button, because a button close to my eye is seemingly of the same size; or I may think it to be as large as the sun, because the apparent diameters of the sun and moon are about equal. But the moon's magnitude remains permanent, neither shrinking nor expanding as my thought changes. Now suppose that all the human race should be annihilated, and suppose (what many persons believe) that there is no intelligence in the universe higher than man's,—it would be irrational to believe that any change would occur in the actual relations or reality of things on account of the extinction of all comprehending minds. The earth would still roll around the sun; all the operations of Nature, all the laws of astronomy, of chemistry, of physics, of mathematics, and so forth, would be the same. Matter would retain the same properties and obey the same forces; all relations of form and extension and number, of quantity and quality, would exist unchanged by the supposed annihilation of the human race. The universe would go on as before, even if nobody were the wiser for it. Just as countless things are to-day true which no man knows, so countless other things would remain true if all men should cease to know. This unchangeable reality, which we see to be nowise affected by human thought, is what I mean by the truth of Being, or the truth of Things. Used in this sense, we see that the word truth stands for all that exists independently of ourselves,—for the vast realities of the universe which are unaffected by our presence or absence, our existence or non-existence.

2. But besides the truth of Things, there is also the truth of Thought. The former is called Real Truth, the latter is called Formal Truth. Everything is true in this second sense which does not violate the laws of logic. For instance, if the city of Hong Kong is built in the form of a square, then its four sides are all equal in length; a straight street laid out connecting two opposite corners would divide the city into two exactly equal portions; and another straight street laid out connecting the other two opposite corners, would cross the first street exactly at right angles, and would cut it exactly at its middle point. Whether Hong Kong is square-built or not, I do not know; but if it is so built, then all these things are true. The truth of Thought only requires that the laws of thought shall be obeyed,—that thought shall be consistent with itself. No matter how false or absurd a theory may be, if measured by the truth of Things; it has the truth of Thought if it is only logical throughout in all its parts. Old Dr. Johnson, it is said, came down one morning to breakfast in high dudgeon, because he had dreamed over-night that he had been beaten in argument by an antagonist; and nothing could reconcile him to his defeat, until his jackal, Boswell, suggested that, since it was all a dream, the Doctor had himself supplied his opponent with all the arguments by which he had been beaten,—in fact that he had only beaten himself, after all. Now so long as he was asleep, the truth of Thought would require the old gentleman to feel mortified at his defeat, since in the dream his antagonist was as real as himself; but the moment he waked up, his mortification became laughable and false, because the premises which would justify it were all gone. By truth of Thought, therefore, I mean logical consistency in the relations of our ideas or conceptions. Hence we speak of a true Catholic as one who practically accepts the authority of his church in all matters of faith; while we should call him a false Catholic, who, claiming to accept this authority as final, should yet persist in thinking independently for himself.

3. Thus we see that the truth of Things is altogether independent of thought; while the truth of Thought is altogether independent of things. But there is a third and very important sense of the word, namely, the truth of Science or Knowledge. Thomas Aquinas, who six hundred years ago earned the title of the "Angelic Doctor" among his fellow schoolmen and theologians, says:—"Intellectual truth is the adjustment of the intellect to the thing, according as the intellect declares that to be which is, and that not to be which is not." [Contra Gentiles, I, 49.] This definition has been acquiesced in by the greatest thinkers who have come after him. Spinoza defines truth as "the congruity of the idea with the thing ideated" [convenientiam ideae cum suo ideato: Cogitata Metaphysica, I, VI, 3]. Kant says:—"The definition of the word truth, to wit, 'the accordance of the cognition with its object,' is pre-supposed in the question [What is truth?]; but we desire to be told, in the answer to it, what is the universal and secure criterion of the truth of every cognition." [Critique of Pure Reason, Bohn's Ed., p. 50]. I will here quote a passage from Sir William Hamilton's Lectures on Logic, p. 377, because it not only defines truth in this third sense, but also defines some other words which are commonly used with much looseness:—

"The end which all our scientific efforts are exerted to accomplish, is Truth and Certainty. Truth is the correspondence or agreement of a cognition with its object; its criterion is the necessity determined by the laws which govern our faculties of knowledge; and Certainty is our consciousness of this necessity. Certainty, or the conscious necessity of knowledge, absolutely excludes the admission of any opposite supposition. Where such appears admissible, doubt and uncertainty arise. If we consider truth by relation to the degree and kind of Certainty, we have to distinguish Knowledge, Belief and Opinion. Knowledge and Belief differ not only in degree, but in kind. Knowledge is a certainty founded upon insight; Belief is a certainty founded upon feeling. The one is perspicuous and objective; the other is obscure and subjective. Each, however, supposes the other; and an assurance is said to be a knowledge or belief, according as the one element or the other preponderates. Opinion is the admission of something as true, where, however, neither insight nor feeling is so intense as to necessitate a perfect certainty. What prevents the admission of a proposition as certain is called Doubt. The approximation of the imperfect certainty of opinion to the perfect certainty of knowledge or belief is called Probability."

It is this last sense, that of the "harmony of thought with reality," as Sir W. Hamilton elsewhere has expressed it, that the word truth is most commonly used. Truth is said to be attained, when thought accurately mirrors the realities and facts of things. The truth of Being is nothing to us, so long as it is beyond our reach; we can but wish and search for it. Neither is the truth of Thought of any value to us, unless we are satisfied that we start right in our thinking. Good reasoning from bad premises is only misleading,—as much so as bad reasoning from good premises. These two kinds of truth, therefore, that of Things and that of Thought, miss connection and are practically worthless until we can join them in the harmony of Science or real knowledge. Science or knowledge,—the reflection of the universe, its facts and laws, in our own minds,—this is the kind of truth that is above all needed by every person. Here lies the difference between the sane and the insane man. The sane man brings his thought into harmony with Nature, perceives things as they are, and acts accordingly. But the insane man mistakes his own feverish fancies and wild hallucinations for actual facts; and he, too, acts accordingly. Knowledge is sanity; ignorance is a species of insanity. We are all insane when we presume to act on insufficient knowledge. Truth, therefore, is the great need of every soul, inasmuch as our action is all at hap-hazard, as likely to end in disaster and misery as in happiness, until we have brought our thinking into harmony with the actual conditions of life and the real facts of Nature. For instance, whatever mechanic thinks that, by joining a strike, he can compel his employer for any length of time to pay ten hours' wages for eight hours' work, or that any artificial combinations are going to override or alter the laws of political economy, is the victim of pitiable ignorance, and needs above everything to study the principles of social science. Truth is thus the food of the mind which strengthens it for dealing with life's practical duties. To establish an equilibrium or natural balance between ourselves and our surroundings, so that a proper action and reaction can take place between our own minds and the universe, is the only path to happiness or to wisdom or to virtue; and truth is the light that must illumine it.

Thus we find that the truth of Being is the grand total of realities to be discovered; that the truth of Thought is the indispensable means of the discovery; and that the truth of Science or real Knowledge, the harmony of our thinking with real being, is the discovery itself. The next question, then, old as human thought itself, is—what is the criterion of truth? By what measure or standard shall we determine it? How can we be sure that we have indeed discovered the truth of Being, and are not deceiving ourselves with some phantasmagoric illusions of our own creation?

1. The only criterion of the truth of Being is experience. "Experiment upon me, and find out!"—that is the command of Nature, when we ask her for her secrets. Nobody discovers anything valuable in any other way. "The fool has to learn by experience," says an old proverb. But some wise one has emended the proverb thus:—"Tis the wise man that learns by experience; the fool never learns at all." Thought must in all cases be tested by facts. The human senses are so many instruments of research; and the human brain has got to use them in acquiring all that it means to learn of the truth of Being. The intellectual faculties are themselves but higher senses, dealing intuitively with the relations of objects just as the senses proper deal with their physical properties; and their use is only a higher kind of experience. "Test and discover!" That is the everlasting law of Nature,—her only gate-way into the truth of Things.

2. The only criterion of the truth of Thought is logic. Logical laws are a sure, and the only, measure of the correctness of the reasoning process, whether inductive or deductive. Whatever reasonings conform to the laws of logic, are sound; and no others are. Thought that is not logically faultless is good for nothing; it is all false. The strength of a chain, as has been well said by Archbishop Whately, is only that of its weakest link; and so the value of a chain of reasoning depends wholly on its perfection in every part. But logic cannot go beyond the truth of Thought; its use as a criterion is solely to judge whether the reasoning is good,—not whether the facts it proceeds upon are real or illusory. Logic, therefore, tests only the workmanship, not the material; it applies its rules solely to determining the skill of the construction, and has nothing to say as to the quality of the stock put in.

3. Now as the truth of Science or knowledge is simply the correspondence of Thought with Things, the harmony between our thinking and the realities of the universe, so the criterion of scientific truth is simply the combination of experience and logic. Logic is, as Kant truly says, a merely negative criterion; that is, nothing can be a scientific truth which violates the laws of logic. In fact, logic has an absolute veto power in all investigation into truth; it declares to be absolutely, universally, eternally worthless whatever is illogical. But experience is the only positive criterion of truth, and its verdict is not absolute; it makes mistakes, is often partial and must be corrected by larger experience, and has no jurisdiction beyond its narrow limits. Nothing whatever will stand the test as a settled fact of knowledge, which violates any law of logic or fails to receive the seal of a positive experience. Every truth of knowledge can be verified. Verification, that is, the possibility of repeating at any time the same experiment with the certainty at all times of repeating the same result, is the test of all undisputed knowledge. Logic and experience, therefore, are the two sides of the one criterion of truth,—negative and positive; but this criterion is not absolute. Want of logic is decisive against any alleged truth; but want of experience only creates a presumption against it. There is no absolute criterion of truth; we cannot escape the possibility of error. Only an infinite experience could give us at the same time a positive and yet an absolute criterion of truth.

Such, then, is the answer I must give to the question, "What is truth?" Truth is the harmony of Thought with Things, the correspondence or agreement of ideas with their objects. Logic is an absolute negative criterion of truth; experience is a fallible positive criterion of it,—the best we have. Truths of Science or Knowledge are thus all subject to two rigorous demands; first, that they be logically harmonious with themselves and with all other proved truths; secondly, that they shall be capable of verification. Without verification, no statement or thought can be accepted as a settled truth,—although it may be a truth, notwithstanding. Doubt attaches to every alleged truth that cannot be verified by repeated observation or experiment. Science is simply clarified and methodized experience; and I think that, for the permanent and stable beliefs of mankind, there is no foundation but Science, in its largest and most inclusive sense.

What a theme of unparalleled sublimity is opened to us by this simple word truth! The love of truth, the passion for truth, has been the inspiration of every great life lived on earth. Jesus spoke for every noble spirit when he said—"To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." The body feeds on a meat that perishes; but the soul feeds on the eternal truth. To seek for truth that we may live the truth, is the grandest aim of our existence. Indeed, the search for truth is a pursuit so full of delight to him who glows with a genuine devotion to it, that Malebranche exclaimed,—“If I held truth captive in my hand, I should open my hand and let it fly, in order that I might again pursue and capture it.” And Lessing in the same spirit declares,—“Did the Almighty, holding in his right hand Truth, and in his left Search after Truth, deign to tender me the one I might prefer,—in all humility, but without hesitation, I should request Search after Truth.” Expressions like these, perhaps, over-state the value of the mere pursuit, for no pursuit, as such, can be an end in itself; truth could not thus animate the soul to life-long and all-absorbing toil to attain it, were it not that, when found, it is the chief blessing of mankind. It is true, as Seneca said, that—"A known truth waxes stale [sordet cognita veritas]"; but only because each special truth is a stepping-stone to a truth higher and grander still. It is the infinity of truth, the impossibility that exists of finding any limit to it, that makes it an object worthy of the supreme love and allegiance of the human soul. In vain shall any one declare—"I am the Truth;"—no human teacher can without audacity utter such words as these. Forever on and on,—that is the destiny of the soul that dedicates itself to truth in absolute and pure devotion. The love of truth is a moral quality of such surpassing excellence and dignity, that it ennobles, exalts and sanctifies the spirit that is inspired by it. What is there so great in human character as the stern yet impassioned veracity, that values what is true above all gain, above all pleasure, above all that is not identified with the absolute integrity of Nature? No joy compares with that which flows from truth, thus pursued and thus won. There is that in human nature which makes the simple arrival at the true more precious and more rewarding than the most brilliant triumphs of common ambition. Truth, like virtue, is its own reward; and the hope of unending being has no better guarantee of its own wisdom than the fact that he who feeds on truth feeds on the eternal, the infinite, the divine.

Miscellaneous.

SKEPTICISM IN BOSTON.

A SESSION WITH THE FREE RELIGIONISTS.

[From the Watchman and Reflector.]

Wishing to hear what these astute expounders of the latest phase of Boston Liberalism had to say, I found myself present, with a brother Congregational minister, at the opening session. A good audience was gathered, many persons of which evidently held no closer sympathy with the speakers than ourselves.

No prayer opened the exercises, which at first surprised us, but subsequently appeared eminently proper, when we learned that the peculiar characteristic of Free Religion is its freedom from religious forms. No hymn was sung. "Birds of prey," as Pascal said of the Jesuits, "never sing." And these took special zest in the conviction that they were the young eagles of a new dispensation gathered together about the carcass of a dead Christianity. Rev. Mr. Frothingham introduced the exercises by an elaborate paper upon "The Aims and Principles of the Association." The elegant manner and exquisite style of the speaker rendered his performance anything but dull. There was very little of the venom in his words which distilled from many of the tongues which followed him. His address was marked rather by a strangely good-natured abandon. "Having defined free religion by a circle large enough to embrace 'every kind of creed and creedlessness,' and having constructed an Olympus for it wide enough to take in every kind of god and no god, he seemed to be utterly indifferent as to which creed or which god any one should accept, if only he would not scowl or make faces at the others."

Having laid down several cardinal propositions of free religionism, so astoundingly loose and godless as to satisfy the most ultra, he seemed to be aware that, if followed to their logical results, they might land their adherents in positions very various and remote from religion. But he expressed his entire indifference to this. "My principles are my horse," he said; "I go where it goes. If it trots to the door of John Calvin, very well. If it brings up in the pastures of Atheism or Pantheism, very well." &c. In fine, while objecting to riding his free horse to death, he seemed perfectly ready to be ridden to death by his free horse. And this, in a word, is what these men are clamoring for, as near as I could gather. "Let every man come upon the course with just such a horse as he pleases," they would say—Unitarian horse shorn of his supernatural tail; Atheistic horse with a free religion saddle; Brahminical horse hitched to a Concord wagon; Infidel horse snorting fire and blasphemy with every breath; all shall have an equal right upon the field. Only let no man dare to put the slightest restraint upon his steed. This is a free religion race. Away with all sectarian bridles, away with all martingale creeds which constrain the head, away with all ecclesiastical curb-bits which hurt the mouth. "Free religion is religion unharnessed," said Mrs. Cheney. "We object to nothing but creeds and sectarianism," said Mr. Frothingham. And so this much I did find out about these people. They are willing men should ride what they please, and ride whither they please—ride like Tam O'Shanter or Mazeppa, ride to Rome or to Geneva, to Hindustan or to the devil, only they shall not have any head-gear upon their horse.

After Mr. Frothingham came Rev. D. A. Wasson, an iron gray man with a good deal of steel, evidently, in his nature, for he presented an argument for natural religion that was as wiry and philosophically exact as one could ask. He showed the relation which religion holds to the other sentiments of our nature, and the relation in which it puts one to the outer world. There was so much of truth in what he said that he seemed really orthodox in comparison with those about him. For while they quite unanimously asserted that it is not necessary to believe in the existence of God in order to be religious, he made the to them astounding statement that, until a man has seen God, he is not only incapable of religion, but incapable even of rational thought and self-consciousness.

Mrs. E. D. Cheney followed—a woman who, having forgotten or having never heard what Christianity has done for her sex, added her very small intellectual mite towards bringing it into contempt. It devolved on her to apply the new gospel to the reforms of the day and the amelioration of society. Before doing so she proceeded to sweep out Christianity with her free religion broom, showing how contemptible the Gospel idea is that sickness and suffering are disciplinary, compared with Mr. Emerson's idea that "sickness is felony," and how shortsighted the sentiment of Jesus is, "the poor ye have always with you," compared with the more worthy and perfectly practicable scheme of free religion, that of banishing poverty at once and forever from society. To the question "Whither tending?" she seemed to be as sublimely indifferent as Mr. Frothingham. With a small opinion of the Christian religion, she had taken Science for her steed, and, mounted firmly on a transcendental side-saddle, she was ready to go wherever it might take her. She thought the indications were that it was heading towards the sun, and that this earth in due time would bring up in that luminary. If so, that would be the best place to go to. And we quite agree with her, since she is one who is urging such an enlargement of woman's sphere as that, the poor earth seems quite incapable of the required expansion.

Quite the feeblest performer of the occasion was Mr. Francis E. Abbot. From all we had heard of this gentleman we expected, at least, to listen to a man of marked intellectual vigor. On the contrary, he presented the aspect of a very little man who, having run against Christianity and been knocked down by it, is laboring under the hallucination that it is Christianity that is staggering from the shock. His part was to show how rapidly the religion of Jesus is coming to an end. His essay was very striking,—for the most striking performance of which we can conceive is the stringing together of a long series of such self-evident axioms as that two and two make five, or a part is greater than the whole. This, without exaggeration, was precisely Mr. Abbot's method of procedure. Aware, as he must have been, of the vast accession which the churches of Christ are constantly receiving in numbers and in strength, he went on to reason that Christianity is coming to an end, from such evidences as these: There is a growing tendency to union among Christians, and union is a certain sign of disintegration. There is an undeniable evidence of vitality in the churches, and vitality is an indisputable proof of decay, &c., &c. Christianity he compared to the slave power that so long cursed this nation with its domination, and he adjured his hearers to put forth their utmost endeavors to crush it. Mr. Abbot seems to be the chosen vessel of Free Religion to bear its gall and bitterness before the people. Of the acerbity of his contents there can be no question. But the vessel is a frail one; and, alas! he little knows how easy it would be for that One against whom he has lifted up his hand to "break it with a rod of iron and dash it in pieces like a potter's vessel."

After the intermission Free Religion turned its attention to the question of the Bible in the public schools. Of course it had nothing to say except on one side of the question. Men who dislike the Bible always and everywhere are not likely to wish it in our schools. Mr. Vickers, of Cincinnati, led the debate in a very tedious speech, though generally candid and containing some sound arguments. Then came a Mr. Russell, of Salem, bristling all over with free religion's quills, complaining that, though a most proficient lecturer in botany, he had been denied the privilege of lecturing in the Salem Normal School, and invoking the vengeance of the audience on the School Board, who had presumed to undervalue the service of so worthy an individual. He complained that though each of the four speakers of the morning had given a separate definition of religion, none of them had hit it. And asking the attention of the audience to a fifth, he raised his stentorian voice to its highest pitch, exclaiming, "Do you ask what religion is? I am religion. Every day I live the conviction deepens on me that I am divine." Now one had only to see the said Mr. Russell as he stood upon the platform, to be convinced of two things, viz., that this last definition of religion had reduced it to a very gross materialism, and secondly that the demand for the exclusion of religion from the public schools had been responded to by the people of Salem in a way which ought to satisfy all parties. A Mr. Stillman next spoke, who appeared to have come all the way from Rhode Island for the purpose of spitting on the Bible before an intelligent audience, applying to it every kind of abuse, and begging that, if it must be retained in school, an expurgated edition be prepared. Then came that dear, grandmotherly old woman, Mrs. Lucretia Mott. And out from under a lace cap, and with a little piping voice, and with a very goody-goody smile, she expressed her joy that all had been so ready to speak their mind. And though she thought better of the Bible than most of them, she was very happy to have listened even to the sweet young man who had preceded her. It was so nice to say what you think. She thought some parts of the Bible were inspired, but still she believed more in the inner light, &c.

Rev. Rowland Connor gave a really candid and straightforward address upon the question. It was to the point, and turned neither to the right hand nor to the left upon side issues. I think all that can be said against the Bible in schools he compressed into his fifteen minutes speech, and if he did not win the convictions of his opponents, he certainly won their respect. A Mrs. Cutler, of Ohio, followed, and then a Mr. Watson, from the audience, asked permission to add a word upon the other side. This he did in a very quiet and unpretending way, but with marked effect. He appealed to the respect which the previous speakers had for pure words, if they had none for Christ and the Bible, whether they could object to having their children read such passages as these, quoting with great beauty and accuracy some of the choicest sayings of our Lord. How precious and exalted these words are, I think I never realized so fully as when they thus fell upon ears that had been pained by the continued utterance of sentiments so infinitely removed from them in dignity and purity.

After a few words from Rabbi Wise, the session closed.

To gather up my impressions of it, I should say that two things characterized it pre-eminently—the absence of any positive spirit of religion or any definite conception of the meaning of that term, and a boundless abuse of the religion of Jesus Christ with endless charges of its failure and short-coming. So that I could not but be reminded of the applicability to them of quaint old Thomas Fuller's description of freethinkers, changing a single word. "They have discovered a short way to celebrity." Having heard that it is a vastly silly thing to believe everything, they take it for granted that it must be a vastly wise thing to believe nothing. Therefore they set up for free religionists, their stock in trade being that they are free from religion. No persons make so large a demand on the religion of others as those who have none of their own; as a highwayman will take greater liberties with our purse than our banker.

MULTUM IN PARVO.

[From the Independent.]

The Watchman and Reflector is apparently straying into forbidden paths. It has been to the Free Religious Meeting in Boston. And it makes some strange confessions. For instance, it says of the Rev. Mr. Frothingham that "there was very little venom in his words." This surprises us. We had supposed that, since the marriage at the Astor House, it was now very generally admitted that Mr. Frothingham was a snake. Speaking of the Rev. Francis E. Abbot's slight physique, The Watchman says: "He little knows how easy it would be for that One against whom he has lifted up his hand to 'break it with a rod of iron and dash it in pieces like a potter's vessel.'" We wonder whether it would not be almost as easy for that same Omnipotent hand to dash in pieces the big-bellied Baptist who penned the above lines. It speaks of Mrs. Cheney as a woman who "has forgotten, or never heard, what Christianity had done for her sex"—a statement so untrue as to be unpardonable. Why will not the orthodox religious press represent its opponents fairly? There is certainly no lack of sound argument on its side. Why, then, should it resort to abuse?

LITTLE KINDNESSES.

[From Auerbach's Gevattersmann.]

Blessed be the hand which gives joy to a child! Who knows when and where the blossom will again unfold its beautiful petals? Cannot almost every one remember some benevolent man, who has performed some friendly act to him in the quiet days of childhood? The Gevattersmann, at this moment, sees himself as a bare-footed boy, at the wooden paling of a poor little garden in his native village, looking longingly at the flowers which bloomed so silently in the bright, silent Sunday morning. The owner of the small patch, a wood-cutter, who spent the whole week in the woods, stepped out of the house to pluck a flower to carry with him to church. He sees the boy standing there, breaks off the most beautiful pink,—it is red sprinkled with white,—and hands it to the boy outside the fence. Neither spoke a word, and the boy ran home with a hop and a leap. And now, here in this distant home, and after so many experiences of so many years, the boy gives utterance to the grateful feeling which then filled his breast. The pink has long ago withered; but it blooms again to-day with a new freshness and life.

LITTLE by little we are ascertaining what it is to be a radical in religion, or perhaps more accurately, a radical without religion. A clerical exponent of a neighboring city patronizingly says that they only decline to believe all that Christ and the Bible say; they take the Bible and sift it, and finding a good deal of chaff in it they throw that to the winds, but are very careful to keep all the wheat." They compare Christ's teachings "with what they themselves know," "and if they find He teaches true, they accept His doctrine, but if they find He is mistaken, as they think He sometimes is, they simply pass on to that which is truer;" and much more of the same sort. Christ mistaken! I think of it; will the clerical radical who thus dishonors his race and his God please specify some mistake of Christ? We wish those careless people who are prone to be attracted by the dismal swamp fire fly of modern radicalism would take heed to their steps before it is everlastingly too late.—Watchman and Reflector.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"THE INDEX is doing well here. They have sold some fifty copies of last week's number at the news-room during the last three days. The above subscriber is one of the most active men in the Unitarian church, or has been, but he is growing fast. A correspondent says,—'we shall give it (free religion) a most hearty support when it convinces us that it means real philanthropy and genuine reform.' Practical work of some kind is what the world stands in need of. The great charge against Christianity, and the one that it is unable to meet, is that it has ever stood in the path of progress. Free Religion must be progress. Christianity has been much preaching, much praying, and little work for humanity. Free Religion should reverse this action. Work for humanity should be the first thing,—all other things should be auxiliary to this. Will you pardon me for making a suggestion? Can you not get some able scientific man to give us a short letter in THE INDEX each week? Christianity says,—'science is its (infidelity's) stronghold.' We admit it and glory in this truth. Science is the only true interpreter of God's word as written on the sky and the earth, and he only can ascertain the truth who reads this word. Pardon my long postscript, and again let me thank you for your brave little paper. We are happy to learn that no one 'can find a steed in The Index or a stable-keeper in its editor.'

—"Sir, such a paper is needed at the present and for the future of this country, to counteract the acts and influence of the Orthodox party of this nation. Sir, we see it verified in the late words and would-be action of that would-be treasonable Convention, or Council, had at Pittsburgh lately. Sir, I for one consider that Convention equally as bad as, if not worse than, the Council now sitting in Rome, in its endeavors to crush and tyrannize over the rights and liberties of the world. Sir, I trust that you, for one, who are capable to expose them, will do it with all the might and talent you are possessed of, through THE INDEX and your lectures. But, sir, their time and money in going there were all thrown away, for their power is gone, and gone to return no more forever. I have conversed with a good many about the proceedings in Pittsburgh, and have not heard one person speak approvingly of their course, but everybody thinks they have hurt their own cause instead of helping it. Sir, I look to see THE INDEX show them out in their true colors."

—"The Free Religionists of this vicinity feel a deep interest in the success of THE INDEX, and you may look for additions to your subscription list from—Go on, brother, in the good work you have so nobly begun. You have the sympathies of the liberal minds of all classes, both in and out of the Church. Your effort will be sustained, because the people are ready for your thought and are starving for just such food as THE INDEX can, and I trust will supply. May THE INDEX receive such encouragement as will stimulate you to speak fearlessly in defence of the noble position you have taken, is the sincere desire of a subscriber."

—"I did not express in the ——— a tithe of the pleasure it afforded me to hear of the birth of THE INDEX. I could not do so on paper. I read THE INDEX each week from one to five times. I study it. Your sermons before the Independent Society of Toledo are grand."

—"I admire the stand you have taken in dropping the name 'Christian.' I think your paper will do more good than any liberal journal that has been started in this country."

—"Your patrons here are delighted with THE INDEX in all respects except the issue which you made with Spencer. That hurt them badly."

—"Thanking you from the depth of my soul for the comfort your paper is to me, I am yours truly."

VIII. PERSEUS AND THE GARDEN OF THE HESPERIDES.

High through the air he wings his rapid flight,
 And homeward hies through realms of liquid light.
 Thrice he beholds the cold and savage Bear,
 And Cancer fierce,—grim monsters of the air.
 With varying course now east, now west he turns,
 Till the paled fire of day no longer burns.
 On shores Hesperian, where huge Atlas reigns
 The sovereign lord of all those fair domains,
 Ere dusky night her starry mantle throws,
 The wanderer, wearied, seeks a brief repose,
 Till twinkling Lucifer with silvery ray
 Shall usher in the earliest blush of day,— Till the faint blush shall turn to rosiest red,
 And Phoebus rise in glory from his bed.
 Here rules the giant king with sway supreme,—
 His kingdom's bound earth's uttermost extreme,
 And the broad sea which, when the day is done,
 Receives the coursers of the setting Sun,
 Panting and tired, and in its cooling waves
 The smoking axles of the chariot laves.
 His thousand flocks and herds of cattle stray
 In meads luxuriant through the livelong day;
 Here no intrusive foot excites his ire,
 No neighbor's wealth lures covetous desire,
 While trees of living gold amaze the view,
 And golden boughs droop low with fruit of golden hue.

IN MEMORIAM.

Who could help feeling a pang, when he heard that the great master of modern fiction was dead? The magician's wand that conjured up so many beautiful figures is stilled forever; and the figures themselves seem in our imagination to put on mourning for him who could give them immortality, yet himself must die. What a marvellous power lived in that creative brain! How it has stirred the heart and quickened the aspirations of the age! Surely, never was the energy of genius more beneficently used. The world is not ungrateful, and drops on the grave of Charles Dickens the heartfelt tribute of a tear.

THE RADICAL.

The announcement in the Radical for June that this might possibly be the last number of the magazine, has surprised all, grieved its friends, and excited in the evangelical press a mean and spiteful exultation. From the latter statement, however, we gladly except the Christian Radical, of Pittsburgh, Pa., which delights us by the manly and magnanimous spirit of the following notice:—

"The Radical for June is full of spirit. A number of the articles are intensely interesting and full of suggestion. We like the Radical because it is always free and fresh, and has its own fearless way of putting things. We are sorry to read the following in this number:—'This may be the last number of the Radical we shall be able to publish. Our subscribers must wait in future until we are prepared to send them a further word.' It appears from this announcement that financially it has had no large prosperity. But how could it? It does too little flattery to make money fast. It pays too little respect to the orthodoxes and creeds and routine of religious thought to get rich. The men who love liberty and utter protests against the shams and crafts of priests and kings do not dress in purple and fine linen. It is the time-servers of creed and sect, the cravens who lick dust from the feet of power, whose lips are set to apology, to whom everything is right, who talk of sin and devil, and proud, cold men with smooth tongue and soft accent, who sell nothing and give to the poor, who have not the pluck to endure for an idea—these are the gentlemen that have smooth sailing, get rich, and fatten in their plenty."

We should like to know the man who, being a thorough and sincere evangelical Christian, can yet speak of a free-thinking periodical in such terms as these.

We have reason to hope, however, that the Radical is not destined thus to perish in the very bloom of its youth. Its editor, Mr. Morse, with a faith bordering on the sublime, began its publication in 1865 almost without means, and has made many a sacrifice to bring it to its present high excellence; and it is through no fault of his that suspension is now threatened. It is doing a work which should not be suffered to cease; and if this falls under the eye of any liberal person possessed of wealth, we venture (though wholly unauthorized to do so) to ask a little timely assistance. The jubilant cackling and fluttering of all the old hens in the country ought to show how powerful has been the influence of the Radical in promoting liberal ideas. THE INDEX could no more do the special work of the Radical than the Radical could do the special work of THE INDEX; and even if it could, we should be guilty of a meanness that ought to sink us into annihilation, if we secretly exulted in a brother's embarrassment through hopes of profiting by it. Faults enough we have,—but not that. The question is, have the American people brains enough to appreciate the thoughtful application of American ideas to American problems, and heart enough to support, generously and spontaneously, a magazine that has too much self-respect to stoop to the ordinary tricks of success? Some medium of publication for longer and more elaborate essays than can find room in THE INDEX, is a necessity; and if the Radical goes down, it will speedily come up again in some other shape. We hope most sincerely that the vantage-ground gained by the Radical will not be sacrificed, but that aid will flow to Mr. Morse in rivers and torrents without delay.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

Ross Winans' "ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS," published by John P. Des Forges, 3 St. Paul St., Baltimore, is a handsome octavo of 343 pages, tinted paper, with an Appendix of 120 pages, a "List of Works Consulted," and indexes both to the body of the work and to the Appendix. Next week we shall print an extract from the book, selected at random as a fair sample of its quality. To the general reader, who has no leisure to study long treatises and perhaps no money to buy them, the Appendix alone is worth the price of the volume ($2.00). Mr. Winans is an earnest believer in God and in Immortality (e. g. p. 81), but discards miracle unreservedly from his philosophy of the universe, and believes thoroughly in science as the great illuminator of the human mind (p. 143). The volume before us is another proof of the wide and rapid spread of liberal ideas at the present time, to which the study of "Comparative Religion," as it is termed, is contributing in a very marked degree.

Henry Lange's POETICAL WORKS, Vol. 1, published by the Author at New Albany, Ind., will be best described as rhymed rationalism. They evince little or no imagination, but are full of liberal and sensible thoughts. As a fair specimen of the volume, we will print next week a poem entitled—"Logic must Conquer." The versification is bald, sometimes harsh; but there is considerable shrewdness and point in some of the lines. We protest, however, against manufacturing a rhyme for reform by docking off the tail of the word enormous, and sending it shivering into the world as enorm (p. 35). Mr. Lange printed two volumes of poetry in German, in 1867 and 1869, with the imprint of Brockhaus, Leipsic. Whoever enjoys liberal sentiments, and is not fastidiously exacting as to poetic elegance, will read the present volume with satisfaction.

Hudson Tuttle's "CAREER OF THE CHRIST-IDEA IN HISTORY," Adams & Co., 25 Bromfield St., Boston, is a neat little volume of 161 pages, devoted to a recapitulation of the various theories of an "incarnation" which have been made the basis of religious systems. Like most such compilations, it betrays the marks of haste, and is not always accurate; but it is clearly written, and will reveal a world of new thoughts to those who have never ventured beyond the narrow enclosures of orthodoxy. Mr. Tuttle is fair and candid, and will make friends of all who read his book in the same spirit as his own.

THE FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY OF TOLEDO.

[SECRETARY'S REPORT.]

The Annual Meeting of this Society was held Tuesday evening, June 7. The following gentlemen were re-elected Trustees for the ensuing year:

Dr. T. M. Cook,
 Mr. H. L. Holloway,
 Mr. Calvin Cone.

Mr. A. E. Macomber was re-elected Secretary, and Mrs. M. J. Barker was elected Treasurer.

The Trustees were instructed to secure the services of Mr. F. E. Abbot as minister of the Society for the ensuing year. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we hereby tender to the gentlemen who have acted as Trustees of this Society for the past year our heartfelt thanks for the fidelity with which they have discharged the duties of their office; that we appreciate the peculiar difficulty and delicacy of their position, the unusual perplexities and embarrassments which they have had to meet during its term; and that we would express in the strongest manner our entire satisfaction with their management of affairs in a crisis fraught with peril to the numbers, property, and general welfare of the Society.

Resolved, That we shall ever remember, with the liveliest gratitude, this noble devotion to ideas at a time when so many threatening circumstances conspired to test it; and that we have full faith to believe that the example thus set will strengthen and encourage many others who now halt irresolutely between the old and the new.

Resolved, That we also remember with gratitude the timely financial aid which has been rendered to the Society, in the liberal donations of property and money to meet the peculiar exigencies of the past year.

Resolved, That we see no cause to regret the independent position assumed by this Society last August, but on the contrary express our determination to adhere to it, as the only position in entire harmony with freedom, progress, and the spirit of the age.

The following is from a recent letter of O. A. Brownson's in the N. Y. Tablet:—"If the Pope should declare an oath, imposed by the Constitution, contrary to the Divine law, I held formerly, and I hold now, that I could not in conscience take it; or, if the Legislature should pass a law, and the Pope should declare that what it required of me, as a citizen, is forbidden by the law of God, I could not obey it, and must submit to the consequences of my disobedience, as did the martyrs in reference to the laws of the Emperors. This simply means, that we must obey God rather than man, and the Pope is the highest authority with every true Catholic for saying what the law of God does or does not forbid."

In some Maryland counties, where the schools for white children are closed for want of funds, the negroes support voluntarily, by their own contributions, free schools for the colored children.

FUTURE RECOGNITION.

ELKTON, MD., May 23, 1870.

F. E. Abbot, Esq.:

DEAR SIR:—It may be true, as you assert in THE INDEX of yesterday, that "countless thousands of aching hearts have found their only solace in the hope of meeting again those who were dearer than life"; but upon what foundation does the hope rest? Admit the truth of the doctrine of a Future Life, and what evidence have we that we shall recognize beyond the grave those we have known and held dear in this world?

Whence comes the soul? Does it enter the body at the moment of conception, or at some future period? Does it, while in the body, grow and become mature and aged with it? Or does it retain the same form and expression through all time? And, if so, is that form callow, youthful or mature?

It is impossible to believe that a soul remains through countless ages, in the next state of existence, in the exact condition it was in when it passed from the body; and yet, if it goes on developing—increasing in growth and years—we can form no conception of the manner in which we shall be able to recognize it in ten, thirty, or sixty years after death. To disturb with doubts a belief that has been made pleasing by poetry and romance, and that is "the greatest anodyne for human sorrow," may be a thankless task; but can a belief in anything but the truth be other than prejudicial to a true and perfect development of our highest nature?

Yours truly,

W. P. EWING.

[The statement referred to not only may be, but is, true. Whether the hope is groundless or well-grounded, is another question, and we do not pretend to dogmatize. As to the nature of a future life, we account all speculation idle,—negative as well as affirmative. For one, we borrow no anxiety on this score. The following paragraph, from a private letter lately received, exactly expresses our own feelings on the subject:—"No true mind ought to let another make or unmake its faith in God or a future. I am satisfied with the hope of another life, and the endeavor to use this aright. If those who have gone before live, I shall live,—if not, I have no desire to survive them, either here or hereafter."

The objections brought against the future recognition of friends weigh but little with us, because, if we live hereafter, we count it impossible to "form any conception" of that life or its conditions. If it is we that live, and not the mere elements of our being, what shall forever separate those that love? But be it as it may, we are content. Our peace does not hinge upon an if. It is less than wisdom to torment ourselves with possibilities. It is enough to act well our part, and to die with the consciousness that we have at least deserved to live by having used life nobly.—ED.]

A FEW WORDS OF CONGRATULATION

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AND TO THE CO-WORKERS FOR UNIVERSAL LIBERTY THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

There was a time when it was dangerous to speak in public about liberty, even here in the now so-called land of liberty. It is very dangerous now in many other lands, and in my dear fatherland, Germany, to address the people and tell them what that divine word means. Real liberty in religion seems to be almost in the same condition, and to have almost as many opponents, as liberty in politics had in the Virginian Assembly in May, 1765. But just so far as we comprehend the real meaning of the word liberty, shall we learn to understand God's Free Religion. While I was at the convention of the Free Religious Association, I thought that Confucius, Socrates, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, and other reformers, with three of their good sisters, had met together on one platform to discuss fairly their individual differences of opinion, and at the same time to affirm most harmoniously the essence of all religions, and acknowledge the Creator of love to whom we all aspire through the reason given by him for us to use. But where reason finds its limit, infinite wisdom is illimitable still, and compels us to have faith and hope! If our good brethren who work for special beliefs or creeds and also our atheistic and materialistic brethren had all been there, I think no one among them would wish to oppose that universal faith in which we must all unite. The real free religionist ought to meet with equal kindness and charity the Trinitarian with his three Gods and the Atheist or Materialist with his forces of Nature. Let us strive to keep aloof from minor speculations, and remember only our great principles in our Association. Every intelligent human being should be invited, with the motto,—"in creeds and politics you may disagree; but, if your reason has attained to faith in Deity, let us have harmony."

If that, in your honest belief, is infidelity or blasphemy, do not call me brother, but call me infidel or blasphemer, until you have come to comprehend this faith; then, and not before then, will you be in the highest sense my brother, with every fibre and attribute of your being. But allow me to call you brother from my stand-point now, because I do sincerely believe that we are all brothers and sisters, created by one eternal Father.

CONSCIENCE AND EDUCATION.

F. E. Abbot, Esq.:

DEAR SIR:—Permit a few thoughts upon the question, "Is Conscience the result of Education?"

Does not the admitted existence of conscience imply the pre-existence of a something within, possessing the faculty of determining what is true or false, right or wrong? Does it not also imply the pre-existence of something as a standard about which to be conscientious? Can conscientiousness result or exist without the concurrence of the three,—the thing, the faculty, and the standard? Answered affirmatively, would it not prove that existing variations or modifications (which cause the inquiry) are only the result of education?

I have the pleasure of seeing THE INDEX, and shall subscribe for it at the first convenient moment.

Respectfully yours,

Miss K. N.

HAVANNA, O., May 28, 1870.

PROTESTANTISM GONE TO SEED.

A few months since I listened to a lecture, delivered in one of our large churches in New Bedford by Dr. Austin Craig, on the study of the World's religions. The Doctor told us that Protestantism had been a great blessing to the world and done incalculable good; but Free Religion (he said) is Protestantism ripened, or gone to seed, and has done and is doing an incalculable amount of evil.

Reflect on us. A little free thought mixed with much Popery, or authority, is incalculably good; but free individual thought is very mischievous, and does incalculable evil. Corn in the milk is very good; but when ripened to a sound kernel it is very bad indeed.

Query. Is it better to think as Moses and Paul, or even as Jesus, thought with their surroundings and conditions, or as Mr. Craig and we ourselves think with our surroundings or conditions? Is it better to be somebody else in part or in whole? (If the former, how much of each ingredient will constitute the best mixture?) Or is it not better to be ourselves in individual completeness,—one with God?

J. W. G.

JESUS: CHRIST; CHRISTIANITY.

These three words mark three stages in the growth of a great religion. During the first stage, Jesus was simply a reformed and reforming Jew. No Messianic aspirations as yet; but a noble life; pure, serene, elevated, lovely, the charm of all beholders; a life that has strong points of resemblance in Fenelon, and in the saintly yet heroic Lucretia Mott. Possibly the historic results might have been similar, had no dream of Messiahship disturbed that calm and noble soul; but we need not speculate as to what might have been; we know what was and is. We have the 23d and 24th chapters of Matthew which show the mild and winning Jesus changed to the denouncing and aspiring Christ: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, generation of vipers;" "then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of Heaven with power and great glory;" there is to be enlargement, conquest, the sending of "angels with great sound of trumpet to gather his elect;" political change, "wars and rumors of wars," "nation against nation," "kingdom against kingdom;" and "verily this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Strange that the plain meaning of these two chapters and of large portions of the Bible should be so often missed! Yet not strange when we consider the power of ecclesiastical atmosphere, dogmatic lenses, mythic development, tradition, custom, to distort, magnify, transform, subdue, stereotype. Whether these and other chapters were retouched or entirely rewritten after the destruction of Jerusalem, or whether they were first committed to writing at the close of the first century, matters little. If we can be sure of anything in regard to the evangelic history, it is that the gentle Jesus became transformed into the Christ. This interpretation of the record is not only the most simple and natural, but the most charitable. The other, that is, the Romish and orthodox interpretation, is fantastic, heterogeneous, contradictory; showing a character at war with itself at one and the same time, hybrid, impossible; a history of that character that never was nor can be reconciled, the despair of all exegesis.

Christianism had a growth of three centuries; and at last, under Constantine, formed an alliance with the Roman Empire ("the greatest," says the last North British Review, "of the three great revolutions of ancient history"), and thenceforward became Christianity; which has been sometimes the blessing, sometimes the bane of the world; which at this very hour is, in the eyes of nearly all Protestants and Liberals, one of the direst afflictions of Spain, Italy, Austria, France; which in none of its orthodox forms has ever been content with spiritual domination; which is now lifting its ambitious head and seeking admission, partly by amendment, partly by false interpretation, into the Constitution of the United States; which is threatening with ruin our Public Schools by its arrogant attempts to impose on them a Protestant Bible.

A LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, Sunday, June 5, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Frothingham at Lyric Hall this morning. He preached from the text, "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." The gist of his sermon was a criticism of religion for standing afar off from the interests and activities of the day. Every word he said I thought true; but he did not show why true. More than this, the distinctions he has made of late in what I have seen in print of his writing, as also in this sermon, are especially vital and important, suggesting, I think, what must be the religious idea of the future; yet both in reading from him and in listening to him, I am strangely impressed with the belief that his advanced thought is due rather to his fine organization, which feels broad relationships and the harmony of things, than from having wrought out the thought and from a knowledge of its history and reason. He seems to me to utter profound truths without knowing the metaphysics that justify them, and possibly would reject the metaphysics if presented, since they are materialistic.

He told some singularly interesting facts regarding the care of idiots, undertaken by a certain great and good man. The method adopted was to come wholly into sympathy with them,—to get fairly down to where they were, before attempting to raise them up. One case that came within the speaker's observation was that of a poor creature who, when brought to the institution, had not sense enough to stand, or even to sit in a chair, but could only lie on the floor, a lump of organized flesh. With this being the teacher began his instructions by getting on the floor also, by learning what interested him, by being interested with him, by leading him on to take an interest in himself, to move his body from side to side, and to move with him, and thus to spend hours lying on the floor with him. In time he taught him to sit up on the floor, then to stand, and finally to walk about.

Mr. Frothingham thought this suggested the method religion should adopt,—that it should come down to where men are, and begin with existing sympathies and actual life, instead of standing at a distance to condemn.

I see by the Independent, of the 2d, that Dr. Bellows is reported as arguing against a creed, since it would exclude D. A. Wasson, the only man who has "mailed" Mr. Abbot's opinions, (referring to Mr. Wasson's article in the May Radical.) The Doctor's instincts are quite right; they will need Mr. Wasson, and much more, unless he writes stronger than in the article referred to.

THE ALTERNATIVE—AUT CÆSAR AUT NULLUS.

To the Rev. Mr. Howard:—

Yes, my dear brother, you never uttered anything more true than when you said, in THE INDEX of the 21st May, that the only tenable ground in opposition to Mr. Abbot and the Free Religionists, on the popular doctrine of the atonement of Christ, is that occupied by the Evangelical Church, and that, "the moment we leave this, there can be no pause until we reach" Mr. Abbot's position.

I once held the five points of Calvinism as tenaciously as John Calvin himself; but when my faith was shaken in the plenary and infallible inspiration of the Bible, as it was first by Dr. Curtis' book on "The Human Element in Divine Inspiration," and afterwards by more profound works of criticism, I saw clearly that I had no fulcrum for my lever. The dogma of plenary inspiration is the sheet anchor of orthodoxy; and well the ecclesiastics of England and Scotland understood this, when they laid it down as the substratum article in their national creeds. If the storm is so long and heavy that the fluke gives way, the ship is driven upon the rock and is wrecked. Yes, it is either Evangelical Orthodoxy, as the regular Baptists and Presbyterians have defined it, or Natural Religion. There is no stopping place. Arminianism, Universalism, and Unitarianism, with all their dilutions and mixtures, are nothing but daubing with untempered mortar,—miserable plasters that will not cover the sore.

But, my dear Sir, does not the Apostle Paul teach, as clearly as human language can express the idea, the absolute sufficiency of Natural Religion, when he declares, in Rom. I., 19, 20: "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and God head?" So also, 14:—"For when the Gentiles which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts, the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another."

Did not Jesus proclaim the same truth when he said, "many shall come from the East and the West, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the Kingdom of Heaven!" Who were those that were outside the "covenant-people of God," and who were not Christians, and yet were sure of future happiness? They were those who, under the teachings of Natural Religion, were striving after a more perfect state, and were therefore accepted of God. Did not Jesus teach the sufficiency, and the complete fullness, of Natural Religion, when he declared that the whole duty of Man was summed up in Love to God and love to Man? Is not the Lord's Prayer a prayer of Natural Religion? If the disciples who asked him to teach them how to pray, were ruined, undone sinners, exposed to eternal hell-fire unless they believed in the vicarious atonement, why, when he was thrown upon his honor and integrity by his confiding disciples, did he put such a prayer in their lips? Listen to the prayers that we teach the people!

I confess that Paul contradicts himself, and that Jesus is made by the Evangelists to say things inconsistent with the announcements I have quoted. But who will impute infallibility to Paul when he disclaims it himself? And who will confide in the Evangelists, with all their errors and discrepancies before him? We receive the statements in support of the sufficiency of Natural Religion and reject the others, because the former correspond with the teachings of all ages and nations, and form a part of the common heritage of mankind. Can it be possible that God as a Father would reveal himself only to that (comparatively) infinitesimal portion of his family called Christians, and leave all the rest to perish in ignorance? What human father would make such a distinction between his own children? We might argue a priori that God, whose benevolence is seen through the Universe, would manifest himself to his own children, as Paul and Jesus declare he has done, by a revelation that would be complete and indestructible, and not be liable to the expurgations, mutilations, and interpolations which the Bible has undergone. In the other world we shall have the a posteriori argument advanced around the table, by the men from the East and the West, to whom Jesus alluded. X.

THE INNER LIGHT.

ED. INDEX.—

Your affirmation, "through the still small voice within must we interpret the highest law of nature," is incomprehensible to my perceptions. I have lived for years supposing I had no conscience,—that reason was my only guide. My mind lays hold upon, and comprehends,—“The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord;” but I do not perceive within any faculty that enables me at once to distinguish evil from good. The analogy between the material and spiritual candles to me seems perfect; the one substance of the material is lighted by a single spark of fire; the one substance of the spiritual by a spark of Divine intelligence. The flame of the material is sustained by oxygen, the light of the spiritual by the spirit of God. Reason does not judge of the qualities of good and evil by the forms under which they appear, but by the impressions made upon the soul. If I perceive this to be good, that to be evil, it is because reason has decided them to be such; the soul accepts the decision as a truth, and uses it as such. In deciding 'this to be good; that to be evil, reason may never err; but where only partial evidence is adduced, it may frequently. Yet the soul receives the decision as truth, and there is no reproving conscience, no other light to reveal the error. Hence the law of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, is executed every day in almost innumerable instances in civilized and so-called enlightened communities, and justified by reason. The field-hand believed it to be right to steal from his master, and in thousands of cases still believes it right to steal from the white planter, and receives legal punishment under protest, believing himself deeply wronged. The Irish peasant believes he is “doing God service” in cheating the landlord. To place moral truths within the light of reason is a work of Free Religion, which I hope has been commenced in your evening school.

JESSE MOODY.

IS CHRISTIANITY ABSOLUTE RELIGION?

BY THOS. M'CLINTOCK.

Now it must be borne in mind, that at the time of the advent of Jesus, and for some six centuries anterior to the ministry of Jesus and Paul, an idea had become prevalent among the Jews, that a distinguished personage would shortly appear, a Prince of the lineage of David, who by military prowess would deliver them from the subjugation to which their enemies had reduced them, and “restore the kingdom to Israel,” investing the Hebrew monarchy with a glory surpassing all former times and all other kingdoms, so that all nations would ultimately bow to the Jewish sceptre, acknowledging Jehovah as the God of the whole earth, and the Jewish ritual and worship as his law. To this anticipated deliverer the epithet “Messiah” or “Anointed One,” became by common acceptance applied, in pre-eminence of all his predecessors. This idea, so enthusiastically cherished, appears to have originated in this way. Soon after the reigns of David and Solomon—a period which was the acme of their national glory—the prosperity of the nation rapidly declined. Disaffections and divisions took place. Judah and Israel were sundered, the two tribes and the ten. Separate governments were set up. Jerusalem and Samaria were arrayed against each other. Violent antipathies were indulged, and brothers' blood by brothers shed mingled in their internecine contests. Foreshadowing the importance of the advent of him who said to the Pharisees of his time, “Go learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice.” This lesson they had yet to learn. While they were zealously sacrificing slain beasts on the antagonistic altars they had erected, they were sacrificing mercy, humanity, and brotherly kindness to the maintenance of a ceremonial religion, which never did, nor could, “purge the conscience from dead works to serve the living God.” Thus divided and weakened, they became an easy prey to contiguous nations. Assyria and Egypt, in turn, carried many of them into exile, and subjected those that remained to tribute. Then came the long captivity of Judah in Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, which involved the destruction of the temple Solomon had built, the carrying away all the treasures of the Lord's house, and, at three several deportations, the king and his family and all the mighty men and artisans, leaving only the poor to be “vine-dressers and husbandmen.” There they remained in servitude “till the reign of the kingdom of Persia,” which had subjugated the Chaldeans. Cyrus, king of Persia, then made proclamation, saying that God had given him all the kingdoms of the earth, and had charged him to build the house of the Lord God of Israel, at Jerusalem. The Jews accordingly returned, and the building of the temple commenced, Cyrus supplying the needful funds, and restoring to them the vessels of the former temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had carried to Babylon and placed in the house of his gods. And during the reigns of Darius and Artaxerxes, the successors of Cyrus, the walls of the city which had been broken down were built again, and the work of restoration consummated. But the trouble of the Hebrews was not ended. Next came the persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes, who had formed a determination either to exterminate the hated race of Jews, or make them conform to the religion and usages of Greece. Failing in the latter, he put multitudes of them to death, subjecting them often to the most horrible tortures. Lastly, Judea and the dependent provinces came under the domination of the Roman empire, including the important period of the life and ministry of Jesus, the demolition of their second and last Temple, and the utter extinction of the nationality of the Jews.

During these vicissitudes and sufferings, their prophets—so long as the race of prophets continued—while denouncing on them divine judgments for their repeated defections from the law given them through Moses, were encouraging them with promises of a glorious national future. Thus Isaiah, the greatest of their prophets, tells them, while yet in captivity in Babylon, as the utterance of Jehovah:—“This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise;”—relief would come through Cyrus, Jehovah's “Anointed” or “Messiah.” Though for their sins he had “given Jacob to the curse and Israel to reproaches,” they should not be forgotten of Jehovah:—“I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins.” “Israel shall be saved by Jehovah with an everlasting salvation; ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end.” See chap. 43, 44, 45, &c., in which similar repetitions abound. Throughout all the prophets, larger and minor, threatenings and consolations of like character are numerous. Judah and Israel were to be reunited. Jer. III. 17, 18:—“They shall call Jerusalem the throne of Jehovah; and all nations shall be gathered unto it. In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance to your fathers.” Predictions of this reunion of the tribes are frequent. And the certainty of their happy future and national perpetuity is often promised in the strongest terms:—“Thus saith Jehovah, that giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night, if those ordinances depart from before me, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me forever.” The promise of the continuance of the royal line of David, and the Mosaic ritual, is equally positive:—“Thus saith Jehovah, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel; neither shall the priests, the Levites, want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually.” Jer. 33, 17, 18. And a similar confirmation is given, (ver. 20, 21,) in regard to God's covenant with David and the Levitical priesthood:—“If ye can break my covenant of the day and the night, then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites, the priests, my ministers.”

In a theocratical government the primary idea naturally is, that God is the king or ruler, and this fact is asserted throughout the Hebrew scriptures from the beginning of the theocracy. Whatever the subordinate agencies, Jehovah is King, and the real actor in what is done; and possessing the properties of finite, imperfect man, his anger burns and his fury smokes, and he even becomes weary with repenting, or changing his mind, in regard to his obstinate and disobedient favorites. Jer. 15, 6, and 18, 8. From the commencement of the Messianic idea, the human instrumentalities he will employ for the redemption or restoration of his chosen people, are to be branches, that is, descendants of David or his fathers. Isai. XI. 1, 12, 13, 14:—“There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth. The envy of Ephraim shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off. They shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines toward the west; they shall spoil them of the east together; they shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab; and the children of Ammon shall obey them.” Jer. XXIII. 5, 6:—“Behold the days come, saith Jehovah, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be David, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is the name by which Jehovah shall call him, our Righteousness.” For this translation see A. Clarke, in loco. Ver. 3d, the prophet says, Jehovah will gather the remnant of his flock out of all countries whither he had driven them, and bring them again to their folds. And ver. 5 and 6, it will be seen, contain a distinct promise of a deliverer. In reference to this passage A. Clarke says, “As there has been no age from the Babylonish captivity to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, in which such a state of prosperity existed, and no king or governor who could answer at all to the characters here given, the passage has been understood to refer to the Lord Jesus Christ, who was a branch out of the stem of Jesse;—a righteous king;—by the power of his spirit and influence of his religion, reigning, prospering, and executing judgment and justice in the earth.” But this will not answer the whole description, as in ver. 8th. The house of Israel is extinct, and that Jesus was a descendant of David is quite doubtful. Moreover, it is abundantly evident, by both Old Testament and New, that the deliverer expected by the Jews was not to be a spiritual but a temporal deliverer, to restore to them their former kingdom and former religion. To this idea they tenaciously held through all the changes that attended them, and seem to have cherished it with increasing intensity as their prospects became increasingly hopeless.

The following Report was read at the Business Session of our late Annual Meeting.

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Third Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association is herewith respectfully presented.

The year has not been without interest to the friends of the Association, though there may be little of actual achievement to record. There are many indications, direct and indirect, that the cause which the Association represents is progressing, and that our organization has not been without its use in giving impulse and a more conscious aim and significance to this progress. The correspondence of the Association, which, between the Annual Meetings, is thus far one of the most important features of its work, reveals a wide-spread and growing interest in its principles and objects. The Association is coming to be recognized as having an influential place and destiny in the religious movements of the time. Though its activity as an organization may seem small, and its treasury may yet disclose no very strong financial constituency, yet the ideas which it stands for are felt to be very vital forces in modern thought and society.

INCORPORATION.

At the last Annual Meeting a vote was passed authorizing the Executive Committee to take such measures as may be necessary for legally incorporating the Association, whenever in their judgment it should be deemed expedient to take the step. It has seemed sufficient to the Committee for the present that they should have the power which this vote gives. No sufficient reason has appeared the past year for using the authority thus put into their hands, and the Association still remains without incorporation.

PUBLICATIONS.

A phonographic Report in pamphlet form of the proceedings of the last Annual Meeting, is the only specific publication we have issued during the year. This has received a considerable circulation, though the sale of it has covered but a small part of the expense of having it printed. Our machinery for the publication and circulation of the Report, as, indeed, of any other matter, is at present very imperfect. Having no place for headquarters, and no room for keeping publications, it is very difficult for us to do much of this kind of work. The little property which we possess in publications, is now deposited in four separate places. The Committee believe that great advantage would accrue to the Association, not only in this matter of publication, but generally, if it could be provided with a central office. If publication were to be undertaken to any great extent, such an office would be absolutely necessary. And publication seems to be one of the most legitimate ways by which the Association may accomplish its work. But the funds in our Treasury have never been sufficient to warrant the incurring of the necessary expenditure for headquarters; and the circulation of our Annual Reports and other publications has doubtless suffered from this cause. For the reader circulation of the Report, the Committee propose that hereafter all members of the Association, paying to its Treasurer annually the sum of one dollar or more, shall be allowed one copy of the Report free from further expense. All persons, therefore, who at this Annual Meeting, or afterwards during the year, shall contribute one dollar or upwards to the Association, and shall give their names and post-office address, will receive a copy of the Report.

Under the head of Publications we are able to announce, however, that an arrangement has been made with THE INDEX, Mr. F. E. Abbot's paper, published at Toledo, Ohio, by which a certain part of that journal each week is devoted to the special interests of the Free Religious Association. The offer of this arrangement, which entails no expense upon the Association, was courteously and generously made by the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX, and was most gratefully accepted by the Executive Committee. It is due to both parties to state that no responsibility rests upon either for the opinions and work of the other in THE INDEX. Our department of the paper is under the editorial charge of the Secretary of the Association, and is designed especially as a channel for such information with regard to the objects and doings of the Association, and the general principles on which it rests, as may be of interest and value to the members and to the general public.

LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS.

The question has arisen the past year as to the relation of this Association to local organizations formed on essentially the same basis, of which there are now several in different parts of the country. The ground which has been taken in this matter is, that, though this Association is American, as its list of officers indicates, it is nevertheless an organization of individuals in their individual capacity alone, and that no delegate system is to be recognized, nor credentials asked for in its Conventions, and that no connection other than that of mutual good-will and of common efforts for the same ends, can properly be established between it and any local society. This Association cannot but be interested in these local organizations. It aims to represent the general movement of which they are a part, and correspondence and co-operation with them is most cordially solicited. The general Association may serve as a central bureau for collecting and imparting information with regard to them; and in many ways they may work together to mutual advantage. But it is a necessary consequence of the principles involved in the free religious movement, that this co-operation and auxiliaryship should be utterly free; that no relation of subordination or of formal dependence should be established even in the slightest degree, between any local religious organization and the national Association, and no membership recognized in either save that of individual free men and free women, responsible only for their own opinions and characters.

CONVENTIONS.

Another question which has received some attention the past year, is the feasibility of holding Conventions, under the auspices of this Association, in different parts of the country. It has been suggested that a series of conventions might be held successfully, beginning in some city in central New York, and extending West to the Mississippi and beyond,—conventions where the many religious problems, speculative and practical, which are now pressing for solution upon hundreds of minds in every considerable community, may be brought for discussion. It is believed that there is no difference of opinion in the Executive Committee as to the desirability of such Conventions, if they could be ably conducted.

The prime difficulty in the way of our undertaking such a work, is the want of men whom we can depute for the service, and of money to meet the expense of sending them. The persons specially fit for such service are hard at work in other fields. It is hoped, however, that something may be done in this direction the coming year; that at least one general Convention may be held next autumn, under the auspices of the Association, in some Western city. But let not our friends in any large town or city wait for the Association to move in this matter. Wherever they are able to meet the local expense of a Convention, and to make the necessary external arrangements for it, the Association will certainly endeavor, so far as lies in its power, to provide speakers and to help forward the objects of the meeting.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION.

With regard to the general Annual Convention, to be held to-morrow in Tremont Temple, the Committee have thought it wise to make some change from the programme by which the two previous Annual Conventions have been conducted; and it may be well to give here an explanation of the change. In each of the last two years a sincere and vigorous attempt was made to bring together, upon the platform of our Annual Meeting, representatives of various religious opinions and sects, and to give to each the opportunity to state, freely and candidly, the convictions that to him or her were most dear. This was done to prove the breadth and fairness of our platform, and with the belief that persons of differing and opposing religious convictions could not thus come together to make a free and earnest comparison of views, without imbibing something more of courtesy, respect and charity for each other's religious opinions and character; and thus something would be done toward that fellowship in spirit which is one of the objects of the Free Religious Association to promote. And this attempt, so far as it succeeded, was not without value in this direction. It is certainly something worthy of note, in the midst of the sectarian animosities of Christendom, to have merely brought together in one assembly, to listen respectfully to each other's religious views, Orthodox Christians of different sects, the Liberal Christian, the Jew, the Supernaturalist, the Spiritualist, the Rationalist, and the so-called Infidel. It is, moreover, one of the objects of the Association to recognize, and, so far as possible, to use and work with, the liberal and progressive tendencies that are manifest in all the sects. Least of all would it inaugurate a new sect. But in this effort at liberality and comprehensiveness, grave misunderstandings as to the objects of the Association have been risked and incurred. Many people have come to think that the Free Religious Association has no principles of its own and no definite purpose,—that its only object is to furnish a wide platform once a year where persons of different theologies, or of no theologies, may meet for an entertaining exercise in polemics. The Committee have thought it expedient, therefore, to use the opportunity of the Convention this year for setting forth more specifically the principles and aims which they believe to be embodied in the Constitution of the Association. Topics and speakers have accordingly been selected with the view of showing how the Free Religious Association may grapple with the speculative and practical religious problems of the time. Yet it must be understood that the speakers, though selected because of their supposed appreciation of, and sympathy with, the general principles which the Association represents, will only speak for themselves, as individual members of the organization, or as friends of its idea. It is hardly necessary to add that in adopting this plan, the Committee do not presume to fix the programme of future meetings, nor to abridge in the least the real comprehensiveness of our platform. They wish rather to show how vastly more comprehensive is the aim of the Association than merely to bring together into mechanical juxtaposition, for a single day of the year, representatives of different sects and non-sects, in or out of Christendom. They wish to show that it seeks to reveal and develop those fundamental sympathies of the human mind with Truth and Justice and Virtue, which, lying within and below all specific forms of religious belief, are the germs of all intellectual and moral progress, and in the free development of which the limits of specific religions and sects are to be passed over and obliterated, and mankind are to come into a moral and spiritual unity, that shall not be mechanical nor artificially eclectic merely, but organic,—a vital assimilation of whatever is true and permanent in the creeds and codes of all religions and all races.

POSSIBLE MISSION OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Your Committee believe, indeed, that the Free Religious Association has a great mission before it, if it only take the opportunity presented to its hands. The very atmosphere of our age is impregnated with the germs of the mightiest social and moral problems. And this country, from the freedom which it offers, seems to be the historically chosen field where these problems are to have their development. The old question of the relation of religion to civil government, which has generally been assumed to be a settled question in the United States, is coming up anew to demand a settlement on the ground of fixed substantial principles, and not on the mere accident that a vast majority of the citizens chance to be of one form of religious faith. The question of the relation of religion to the public schools, with its still more subordinate question of the reading of the Bible as a religious exercise in the schools—a question which is now just opening a gigantic struggle that must extend through the country—is but a part of this greater question of the connection between religion and the State, which lies behind, and where the real conflict must finally come. Involved with this are the minor conflicts in regard to Sunday laws and traditions, and the unjust statutes in some of the States concerning legal oaths and the religious qualifications of jurors and witnesses in courts. Then there are the multifarious problems, speculative and practical, which are raised by modern science and philosophy, and which already, though crudely solved or not solved at all, are affecting the actual life of vast numbers of people. Add to these the great social problems that are now everywhere seeking of public opinion some solution,—as the demand for a new and more equitable adjustment of the relations between Capital and Labor; the agitation for a readjustment, in accordance with the new light and civilization of the age, of the relations between man and woman in the various functions of society; the search for better methods of meeting the evils of pauperism, intemperance, licentiousness, and crime of every kind; and, generally, the call for some more effective application of the intelligence, virtue, and culture that are anywhere stored up in individuals or families, or favored portions of the community, to the conduct of government and to the improvement and elevation of society at large. And add still again the problem, both social and civil, which we in this country have to work out,—of a nation which is to assimilate into its own life and institutions all religions and races of men,—which is to do justice and give citizenship to all; to the African, the Indian, and the Mongolian, as well as to the Caucasian stock; to the Irish Catholic, the German skeptic, and the Chinese Confucian and Buddhist, as well as to the descendants of Protestantism and Puritanism. Such are some of the problems, aside from those more purely ecclesiastical and religious, which are put into the hands of America to solve. Now if Religion, out of its manifold historic career and experience, out of its claim to touch the deepest things in human nature and to represent man's grandest inspirations, has any aid to offer in the solution of these problems (and if it has not, then it must, indeed stand aside, as a force that has had its day and is no longer available in human society)—but if Religion in any form can help forward the settlement of these questions, then surely the Free Religious Association, committed to the defence of no dogmas, untrammelled by traditions, having no lines of church authority to hold, utterly disencumbered of all ecclesiastical impediments, cordially allying itself with science, free to accept truth wherever and however found, and holding itself perfectly plastic to the spirit of the age, should be able to render some service in the struggle with these great problems, whose solution is to determine the future of American government and life. Such is a hint of the opportunities which await the personal faith and fidelity that shall transform them into living forces and accomplished facts.

Beautiful Women!

All women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty? Women know, too, that when men speak of the intellect of women, they speak critically, tamely, coolly; but when they come to speak of the charms of a beautiful woman, their language and their eyes kindle with an enthusiasm which shows them to be profoundly, if not, indeed, ridiculously in earnest. It is part of the natural sagacity of women to perceive all this, and therefore employ every allowable art to become the goddess of that adoration. Preach to the contrary, as we may, against the arts employed by women for enhancing their beauty, there still stands the eternal fact, that the world does not prefer the society of an ugly woman of genius to that of a beauty of less intellectual acquirements. The world has yet allowed no higher mission to woman than to be beautiful, and it would seem that the ladies of the present age are carrying this idea of the world to greater extremes than ever, for all women now to whom nature has denied the talismanic power of beauty, supply the deficiency by the use of a most delightful toilet article, known as the "Bloom of Youth," which has been lately introduced into this country by GEORGE W. LAIRD, a delicate beautifier, which smooths out all indentations, furrows, scars; removing tan, freckles, and discolorations from the skin, leaving the complexion clear, brilliant, and beautiful, the skin soft and smooth. With the assistance of this new American trick of a Lady's toilet, female beauty is destined to play a larger part in the admiration of men and the ambition of women than all the arts employed since her creation. Prof. C. F. Chandler, Chemist to the Metropolitan Board of Health, has recently prepared a chemical analysis of this delightful toilet preparation, and reported that the "Bloom of Youth" was harmless, containing nothing injurious to the health. Ladies need have no fear of using this invaluable toilet acquisition.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

THE LAST BATTLE ON THE CREED QUESTION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, June 12, 1870.]

"The faith in Jesus as the promised Messiah was the fundamental doctrine on which the whole structure of the Church arose."

NEANDER, quoted by Rev. A. P. Putnam in the Liberal Christian.

Salvation by belief was the burden of the Christian gospel, as preached by the apostles and reiterated by all their successors. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved,"—this was the "gospel of good news" which at last annihilated the religions of Greece and Rome, and crowned Christianity as the mistress of the Western world. The attempts of liberal thinkers to find some other basis for Christianity than this original gospel,—for instance, love to God and man,—are made in defiance of the laws of history, and mark only a period of transition. Whoever once comes to appreciate the truth that religions are historical phenomena,—that they are objective world-facts to be scientifically described and defined, not merely subjective experiences of the individual consciousness,—and that their origin, development and decay constitute an organic process governed by certain peculiar and fundamental ideas,—will learn in time to measure the duration of Christianity as an historical religion by the ability of the CHRIST-IDEA to retain its hold on the human mind. Unless Jesus shall retain forever the supernatural primacy of the race, as taught by the Church, his religion will at last cease to exist as an historical phenomenon. Its universal truths will gradually lose their accidental connection with his name; and Jesus will at last assume the place in history which belongs to him as a natural product of his age.

It was the consciousness of the early church that Christianity had fundamental doctrines to be believed, which gradually created the creeds of Christendom. Perhaps mere belief, alone, and unaccompanied by corresponding character and action, has rarely been held to be quite sufficient to ensure salvation; but it has always been held to be an essential condition of salvation. Submissive discipleship to Jesus as the Son of God, the appointed Savior of the world, has always been regarded in the Christian Church as indispensable to acceptance with God; and this discipleship was impossible except through a deep belief of Christian doctrine. Creeds, therefore, more or less explicit, have been found necessary by all branches of the Christian Church. There can be no Christian fellowship except in a common belief in the Christ as divine Lord and Savior; there can be no Christian character except in practical submission to his commands as such. Creeds have thus always been made, directly or indirectly, tests of character and conditions of fellowship in the Christian Church.

What is a creed? And what are the objections to creeds?

The word creed, it is almost superfluous to repeat, comes from the Latin credo, I believe; and, taken in its broadest sense, every belief may be called by that name. You and I have each our individual beliefs, and if any one chooses to call these our creeds, I have certainly no objection. Only it should be distinctly borne in mind that, in the common use of language, nobody understands the word in this sense. It is quibbling and equivocating of the meanest kind, in a discussion of the comparative advantages and disadvantages of creeds, to lug in this secondary and unusual meaning of the term, for the purpose of distracting attention from the real question in debate. Yet this is often done by men who ought to know better. A creed, in the proper sense of the word and the only sense involved in such discussion, is a statement of theological doctrine adopted as the basis of a religious organization. I shall confine myself to this sense of the word.

Now I maintain that creeds, long or short, formal or informal, inevitably become both tests of character and conditions of fellowship. Once adopted by a sect, a creed establishes a standard of orthodoxy in that sect; and whoever dissents from it is made to bear the stigma of heterodoxy or heresy. Believing that a correct apprehension of fundamental Christian doctrine is in some way connected with the truest Christian character, the majority come to look upon the heretic as really being to blame for his heresy,—as owing it, in fact, to some spiritual or moral obliquity. When a certain opinion is held to be the essential condition of the purest or highest Christian character, dissent from that opinion must be held to have its root in something evil, and to be prima facie proof of moral unsoundness. Whatever goodness appears in the heretic is set down as at the best merely external,—at the worst as hypocritical. Something must be wrong with the man who refuses to accept fundamental Christian truth; his exterior may be very fair, and no human eye may discover the rotten spot in his character, but God, who sees the heart, must behold the cherished sin which, if Christian belief be a duty, must be the hidden cause of his disbelief. Once admit that it is the Divinely imposed duty of all men to be Christians, and that they cannot be Christians without believing thus or so,—and I contend that it is both logically and morally impossible to account him a really good man who rejects the essential beliefs. That this is true, the experience of mankind for nearly two thousand years conclusively proves; and our own observation, if we carry eyes in our heads, brings overwhelming confirmation of the fact. Every creed, therefore, once adopted, straightway tends to become a test of personal character; and just in proportion as the creed is vitally held, will this tendency practically manifest itself.

Furthermore, when the majority of a sect have once adopted a creed as their bond of union, dissenters are, of course, only admitted by sufferance. They are not welcomed, but endured; they do not come in on equal terms with the rest, but are allowed to enjoy only an inferior, a qualified fellowship; they are made to feel themselves to be a minority, not possessed of equal rights with the rest, but obliged to dispense with the privilege of having their own opinions represented in the common confession of the sect. Even if not directly excluded, they are compelled to bow their necks to the yoke of the majority, and are thus dangerously wounded in their self-respect. There is something very humiliating in the enforced posture of inequality. Every proud and high-spirited man, conscious of his own violated right to stand on a level with the rest, will be so galled by the consciousness of being a pensioner on the generosity of his fellows, as to prefer absolute exclusion to this half-contemptuous toleration. He will think total absence from the banquet a less privation than the dubious charity of a seat at the second table. Nor will he think himself relieved from this degrading position by the appending of a conscience-clause to the common creed. The offence still remains, that, while the majority enjoy the privilege of declaring their belief in common, he is debarred from this right, and must content himself with being merely a recognized disbeliever or dissenter. The rest can speak,—he is muzzled. He may save his sincerity, but must sacrifice a part of his self-respect. In this manner, every creed, even a majority-creed, tends to become a condition of fellowship; for fellowship on such terms can be purchased only by a surrender of manly spirit. The high-minded will spurn it; only those who are careless of their own moral dignity will stoop to accept it.

Not only do creeds thus plainly and inevitably lead to self-righteous judgments on character and flagrant offences against human brotherhood, but they operate in countless ways to block the path of progress. They intimidate the weak in mind into a refusal to think; and they compel the vigorous intellect either to suppress its convictions for the sake of policy, or else to avow them at a sacrifice unjustly made necessary. They are in every case so many walls to be battered down,—so many chains to be snapped asunder,—so many devils to be cast out. For the simple reason that the creed expresses the average mind, it represses the mind that is above the average. It is a weapon which ignorance can always wield with fatal effect against superior knowledge, as in the case of Friar Bacon, who was hounded into his grave for daring to be wiser than his stupid contemporaries. Science has had to fight her way over the dead carcasses of the creeds, and has enough still on her hands to keep her sword well fleshed for many a long year. Not till the last creed is flat on its back, stark and cold, will humanity shake off its chains, rise to its feet and go on its way rejoicing.

I care not in what light considered, creeds are the badge of slavery. If freedom is a blessing, they must be trampled under foot. It is with this conviction that I have read the accounts in the papers of the last battle on the creed-question in Boston. Neither you nor I have any immediate concern with the endless and resultless conflicts going on among the Unitarians,—for we are outside their lines. Yet for myself, born and bred among them, and attached to many of them by the strongest personal ties, I find that my interest remains vivid in Unitarian controversies, partly because I know and love many of the men engaged in them, and still more because I believe that here the last stronghold of the creeds is standing a desperate siege. Let me sketch the chief features of the late struggle over the creed-question in Boston.

In Dr. Channing's Essay "On Creeds," to which you have just listened, I am struck with two things. He utters a strong protest against "human creeds," in words burning with the love of liberty; yet at the same time he accepts the infallibility of Jesus, and with language equally strong gives utterance to his own devotion to him. Christ is the creed, the only creed, of Dr. Channing. Now in this respect, in the very inconsistency and self contradiction of his attitude, he faithfully represents the Unitarian denomination as a whole; or rather they faithfully represent him. This double devotion to liberty and the Lord Jesus, which with all sorts of unconscious sophisms they fondly imagine they reconcile with each other, they inherit from Channing; and it is the standing enigma of the times to comprehend. Either alone is perfectly comprehensible; but how any sane man can in one breath assert, as Dr. Bellows asserts, his devotion to "absolute and perfect liberty," and also his devotion to "Christian faith," i. e. faith in the Lord Jesus, does indeed pass my comprehension. Accepting the bare fact, however, I can perfectly well account for its existence by remembering that in Dr. Bellows Romanism and Free Religion meet, and that his miraculously swift changes of base are the oscillations of a noble nature from one extreme to the other. I think I never heard of a man who could accomplish the journey from the Vatican to Horticultural Hall in so few minutes, and can only account for it on the theory that he goes by telegraph. It takes the Atlantic Cable to explain his travels.

However this may be, the American Unitarian Association and the National Conference, which are distinct organizations, are both pledged to the shortest possible Christian creed,—the former to "pure Christianity," the latter to "the Lord Jesus Christ." Yet individually and collectively, they are equally pledged to "spiritual freedom." Both sides of Dr. Channing, therefore, are fully represented, and neither side seems able to get uppermost. Like the Irishman who was bent on "surrounding his enemy," every Unitarian convention is determined to surround its one question that will not stay "settled." Once a year they "settle it forever," by voting it simultaneously up and down. At the recent annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. Hepworth brought forward a resolution to provide for drawing up a more definite and specific creed than the simple confession of faith in Christ and Christianity. This movement was to be expected from the recent conduct of the Liberal Christian; and it was supposed to have the full approval of Dr. Bellows. But more than one surprise was in store for the public. Rev. Robert Collyer, the genial and generous and (as we all thought) radical blacksmith-preacher, came out in favor of the new creed; while Dr. Bellows, the large-hearted and (as we all thought) dyed-in-the-wool conservative, came out plump against it. Verily, Chicago and New York get fearfully "mixed," when they go down East together. The climate does not agree with their self-consistency. Mr. Collyer wanted a creed "good for this day only," not stopping to notice that the train he was taking was the "lightning express" for Rome; while Dr. Bellows was so grateful to Mr. Wasson for "doing his sum" for him, that he failed to remember that Unitarianism, according to Mr. Wasson's arithmetic, foots up less than zero.

When the vote was taken, it was largely against Mr. Hepworth's motion. But Mr. Hepworth took his defeat with pluck and good sense, and I feel considerable respect for his course. "I give you notice," he said, "that I am not exactly down, and I am going to keep this thing going until I get what I ask. I shall fight it out if it takes all summer." These words have a manly ring, and I feel a sympathy for Mr. Hepworth in his defeat which I never felt for him in all his empty triumphs. He seems to have taken up an unpopular movement through faith in something or other (what, I confess, I am puzzled to tell), and to have stuck to it in the face of more opposition than I believed he could stand. If he keeps his word and persists in his demand, he will prove himself possessed of sturdier qualities than I ever supposed.

More than this, I believe he will succeed. An editorial article in the New York Independent, which gives an account of this meeting of the Unitarian Association, is entitled—"A Church without a Creed." This implies a misconception and gives a false impression of the facts. Neither party in the discussion on Mr. Hepworth's motion would deny that they were pledged to the Christian name and faith by the well-known preamble. This, though not a formal creed, is virtually one, and is confessedly so regarded by both parties to the discussion. The question was not whether they should have no creed at all, but whether they should be content with the one they have. The vote taken, consequently, simply means that they have all the creed they want. This fact somewhat abates the magnificence of Dr. Bellows' profession of fealty to "absolute and perfect liberty." The "hurrah for liberty!" sounds a little comical when you catch a glimpse of the hand-cuffs. The Unitarians may have a very small creed, but it is quite large enough to keep at a distance all but professing Christians. It is as effective a condition of fellowship as the Augsburg Confession or the Thirty-nine Articles. Now whether the creed is short or long, is of no sort of consequence. Its simple toleration commits the Unitarians to the same course as that of any other creeded sect, and Mr. Hepworth does but hold them to their premises. Logic is on Mr. Hepworth's side, and it is a terribly potent auxiliary. "You may as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb," he argues; "your preamble is a creed, and I want to make it worth something." Without a particle of sympathy for his purpose, I see that he is carrying out honestly the reactionary policy entered upon by the National Conference; and I believe he will win in the end, if he perseveres. That creed is fated to grow, if not uprooted.

Either the radicals or the conservatives will be forced to leave the Unitarian denomination,—it matters little which. The next session of the National Conference in the autumn will probably witness a renewal of the everlasting conflict of ideas which has come down from the mind of Channing himself, and which grows more and more evident every day. The extreme conservatives become more and more earnest for a definite statement of faith; the extreme radicals feel more and more keenly the bondage of the enforced Christian name and confession; the neutral majority will by degrees be forced to divide itself between the two extremes. In revolutionary times, moderate parties stand no chance; and a revolution is going on among the Unitarians. The great battle of ideas, of freedom and Christianity, which covers the whole western hemisphere, is waged about the capital point in that denomination; and all the other sects look on as secretly interested spectators of the conflict. The truth of the Christian confession is really under debate; and that is the meaning of all this endless warfare of radicals and conservatives in that numerically feeble sect. Within a very few years it will become impossible for both wings to work together; the preamble-creed will drive them asunder, one party seeking a stronger creed, the other discrediting even the creedlet of the Christian Confession. Mr. Hepworth may well take heart; the game is his. Dr. Bellows will certainly be forced at last to go with him, rather than with the radicals. Ideas drive men at the last; and the Unitarians have entered on a path which conducts back to the Dark Ages. For a while the radicals may reluctantly accompany them; but there will be a limit to this complacency. The world is sick of creeds, which have proved themselves the deadly enemies of freedom, fellowship and progress; and you and I, who have chosen the latter, may wait hopefully till events have proved the wisdom of our choice.

Miscellaneous.

CREDULITY AND THE CLERGY.

[From "One Religion: Many Creeds," by Ross Winans.]

Man, by nature and for wise purposes, has a predisposition to credulity. He loves the marvellous and the mysterious. From this phase of his character proceeds the wonderful influence which the false doctrine of supernatural revelation has so long maintained over the human mind, through the incomprehensible mysteries contained in the Bible, based upon prophecy and miracles. The less man's reasoning faculties are developed, the greater is the attraction which the marvellous and miraculous have for him; and the reader is the credence he gives to them. Hence it is the least enlightened of our race, both in this and every other age of the world, who are the most liable to be led astray by tales of sorcery, witchcraft and ghosts. And have not witchcraft and supernatural appearances of departed spirits as great a claim on our credulity as the miracles of the Bible? The existing generation of men has advanced toward mental manhood, so far as to discard many of the superstitious fictions of the incipient stage of the human race; and would emancipate itself still more rapidly and completely than it is doing, but for the struggle made against it by the churches. And they are now the only obstacle to man's entire deliverance from such a thralldom. Seeing, however, how much their influence and their gain are endangered by the spread of learning and intelligence, they are the more tenacious and persistent in their efforts to uphold and to root more deeply still into the minds of the people a superstitious belief in the mysteries of the Bible. But this once mighty influence is on the wane. The light of irrefutable truth has dawned upon the mental vision of all the civilized nations upon earth; and the darkness of theological error will soon be forever dispersed. Let the churches, if they be wise, look to this matter in time. The true and lasting interest of the clergy lies in conforming without delay to the imperative intellectual demands of the age. Unadulterated truth must be taught from the pulpit—if anything at all. The people will not, much longer, continue to listen to doctrines and dogmas, for the belief of which there exists in man not one single innate faculty commending them either to the judgment or to the heart; but which, on the contrary, cause his whole nature to revolt.

Let those learned men, who are the chief dignitaries of the churches, look to the intellectual development of our times. They should be the allies, and not the foes, of human intellect. To them all the truths of science should be welcome, because they are divine. That true religion, which exists in the heart as well as in the soul, needs no fables to recommend it to our acceptance. The so-called sacred Books, to which they still call upon us to yield a slavish faith, should be acknowledged by them to be without that sanctity which cannot attach to them, if they be contradicted by Geology and by Astronomy, and by every new discovery of natural and physical truths. The stars alone are a perpetual reproof to the ignorant mythologies, with which the clergy still endeavor to mislead the people. Newton, Laplace, Leverrier and Ross, were greater teachers of religion than any Pope or Bishop, or other ecclesiastic, who ever lived or preached. If, instead of theological and doctrinal discourses founded upon historical errors and false ideas of God, the preachers and teachers, accepting the great truths of science, would preach God in all his works and religion in its purity, conformably to the intelligence of the age—let the immediate consequences be what they might—their efforts would prove beneficial in the highest degree. Jesus so taught religion in the two commandments; for which teaching he was crucified. God is ever teaching it in its fulness. The time is ripening for this development. Uneasiness and doubt sit within the assemblies of all mythological worshippers. It is not only the sheep, but the shepherds, who see the approaching change, and know it to be inevitable.

Great thoughts are heaving in the world's wide breast;

The time is heaving with a mighty birth;

The old ideas fall:

Men wander up and down in wild unrest:
A sense of change preparing for the earth
Broods over all!

But not to me—oh, not to me appear

Perpetual glooms; I see the heavenly ray:

I feel the healthful motion of the sphere;

I see the splendor of a brighter day.

Ever since Infant Time began,

More or less darkness has been over man;

It rolls and shrivels up.

It melts away!

The intellectual culture of the many who are yearning for good, is more than a match for the learned priestcraft that domineered over the too credulous of former ages. The printing-press now speaks to the masses, and rescues them from the thralldom of the oracles that spoke of old.

WHAT HAPPENED IN THE CAT'S ABSENCE.

[There is something so exquisitely graceful and genial in the subjoined book-notice, extracted from the N. Y. Independent, that we cannot forbear sharing with our friends the pleasure with which we read it. If a little gratitude for repeated kindly notices from the Independent has surreptitiously slipped in among our motives, we need not feel ashamed of that.—ED.]

We, the book-editor, sitting in the office here, on a quiet afternoon, when the editor-in-chief is away and the managing editor is among the green hills of the land of Penn, do bring to remembrance that old and excellent lyric which says and take from our desk a new book, with this title: Sanctum Sanctorum, or Proof-Sheets from an Editor's Table, by Theodore Tilton. If our chief were here to shake his "ambrosial locks" at us in his characteristic manner—not stern, but very conclusive—we should, of course, lay the book aside out of deference to the modesty of him who has to be responsible for what we say. But we have long desired that Mr. Tilton's greatest leaders—struck out in the heat of feeling, full of indignation against wrong, full of contempt of cowardice, full of eloquence and graceful utterance—should be picked up as they float like ordinary newspaper articles into forgetfulness, and find a conservator in the art of the book-binder. And so, beginning with his maiden sketch of a visit to Irving, we have here the articles that will best bear reproduction in this shape. Sheldon & Company have bound up thirty-nine of the best of these essays on men and things; and to us, as we read them over again with delight, they ring like orations and sing like poems. They—but we think we hear a well-known tread upon the stairs.

"When the cat's away," etc.,

KEEPING AN EYE TO BUSINESS.

[From the Morning Star (Freewill Baptist), New York and Dover, N. H.]

ONE THING FOR CONVERTS.—Stability in religion is of infinite importance. This putting the hand to the plough and looking back is sad business. Often do ministers inquire how to prevent it. One very important precaution is, to induce converts to take a religious paper. Those who labor in revivals ought not to leave them without strongly urging them to take the Star. No other reading, except the Bible, will so nourish and strengthen the new life within them, and fasten them to the cross of Christ. Brethren should look well to this; instruct their converts that their soul's safety demands that they promptly subscribe for and faithfully read the Star.

[This is literally obeying the precept of Ralph Waldo Emerson,—“Hitch your wagon to a star.”—Ed.]

LOGIC WILL CONQUER.

[From Henry Lange's "Poetical Works."]

Logic has power which no one can shake,
Logic will tremble at naught;
Logic will call till the dreaming awake;
Truth must be forced, must be taught.
Logic is truth, nothing more, nothing less,
Truth will not change in its course;
Maniacs may try it, the truth to suppress,
Logic will conquer by force.
Logic is bound to be ever supreme,
Logic is able to force its esteem.

Logic will rise, as the knowledge will grow,
Gently its power will spread;
Logic brings progress, and progress moves slow,
Still it goes ever ahead.
No one on earth has the power to check
Truth in its onward career;
Reason, advancing, will never fall back;
Logic moves on without fear.
Logic will conquer, for logic is right,
Logic crowds on, till at last there is light!

Ages have passed, but their progress remains;
Logic has outlived the form;
Logic will never give up what it gains,
Yet it takes never by storm.
Pleasantly logic will lead to advance,
Logic has force to convince;
Progress commenced with the birthday of sense,
Logic advanced ever since.
Logic keeps moving, it never stands still;
Logic is mighty, and conquer it will!

Logic has power, which every one feels,
Logic makes ignorance yield;
Logic decides, where the human appeals,
Logic is thinking men's shield.
Logic is willing to serve those that "see,"
Truth is instructing the blind;
Logic is busy, the shackled to free,
Logic is balm to their mind.
Logic, though modest, will conquer at last,
Partly it conquered, it outlived the past!

Logic is battling to conquer its foe,
Freedom of thought is its aim;
Logic is working, that mankind may "know,"
Truth will bring fiction to shame.
Truth shakes the temple that fiction has built,
Logic will not let it stand;
Virtue will triumph at last over guilt,
Logic will rule in the end.
Logic moves on, while the age must keep pace,
Logic must save from destruction this race.

Fancy and fiction are nearing their doom,
Logic is bound to control;
Man will emerge yet from darkness and gloom,
Truth will inhabit the soul.
Faith is a phantom, created to die,
Logic has life, it is real;
Logic will live to see ages pass by;
Man will yet reason and feel.
Logic will conquer, the darkness will cease,
Mankind will "know," and the world will have peace!

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

The regular meeting of the Executive Committee was held Monday, May 9th. Present, Messrs. Padel-ford, Smith, Hall, Livermore, Metcalf, Chickering, Crosby, Kennard, Lyman, Shattuck, Fox and Lowe.

The report of the Western States Committee submitted letters from Rev. C. H. Brigham, Western Secretary, and recommended the following appropriations, which were made:

To the society in Toledo, Ohio.....	$500
" " Indianapolis.....	500
For expenses of the office in Chicago.....	500

[The "society in Toledo" here referred to is not the old Unitarian Society, which voted to change its name to "First Independent Society" Aug. 22, 1869, but a new society organized by the conservative minority who seceded at that time.—Ed.]

MEETING OF THE FRIENDS OF PROGRESS.—The Friends of Progress closed a three days session of their annual meeting, near Waterloo, Seneca county, quite recently. The meeting was presided over by Aaron M. Powell, of New York, late editor of the Anti-Slavery Standard. The meeting was well attended throughout, and the following subjects came up for discussion:—Religion; Woman's right to the ballot; Our treatment of the Indians; Temperance, and the Hours of Labor. The platform was perfectly free to all present, and the discussion was earnest and radical, and conducted in the most catholic spirit. Mr. Powell, C. D. B. Mills, Dr. Lydia A. Strowbridge, Amy Post, Mrs. Phebe B. Dean, Dr. Baker, of Shortsville, Mr. McIntosh, H. L. Green and others took a part in the discussion. A very large congregation was in attendance on Sunday, and gave the best of attention to the remarks of the speakers.

Mr. Ernest Renan, in a recently published article, expresses the opinion that there are but two questions totally mysterious—the origin of the human conscience, and the supreme end of the Universe.

A WARNING.

[The spirit of sectarianism is well illustrated by the following, from the Baptist Watchman and Reflector.]

BAPTISTS, BEWARE!—The American Missionary Association are raising thousands upon thousands for freedmen. Their employees have repeatedly announced (and we judge it to be, from the tenor of their publications, a settled habit) that they are not a sectarian organization, and yet who ever heard of their establishing any other than Congregational or Presbyterian churches? One of their Secretaries published, as early as April, 1868, this remarkable utterance, under his own name:—

"The American Missionary Association is not a sectarian organization, but only an orthodox one."

How delicate the distinction! And he goes on to say that it embraces among its supporters representatives of all evangelical denominations. No doubt! And no doubt Baptists have put thousands of dollars into this organization, which have gone to build up Congregational churches among the freedmen of the South.

Baptists should beware. They should question all agents carefully, and send their money for freedmen only to Ebenezer Cauldwell, Treasurer of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, Room 12, No. 39 Park Row, New York city.

CRITICISM ON STILTS.

[From the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.]

A cotemporary is greatly exercised about a sensational article in the Home Monthly drawing a parallel between Punshon and Munsey. The article criticised is in the startling vein, with many good hits, but much that might, perhaps, be bettered. Certainly the rhodomontade of the critic furnishes an ample apology for the writer whom it ridicules. Or does the critic out-Herod the criticised in the same vein, as a delicate compliment to his style? The grandiloquence of the following can scarcely fail to moderate the transports of the Monthly:

"And blow him with one hurricane-puff of bombast through all the heroic possibilities of the grandest of all the inspired prophets of Israel, even in a whirlwind of incandescent nonsense, up to the third heaven," &c.

Just so! "Crayon" had better not try it again, or his Censor will have to be put in a strait-jacket.

NOVEL CONFLICT.—A short time since, Van Amburg's menagerie was obliged to pass Shavy's residence. A little before daylight, Nash, the keeper of the elephant, Tippoo Saib, as he was passing over the road with his elephant, discovered Shavy, seated upon a fence, watching a bull which he had turned upon the road. It was pawing and bellowing, and throwing up a tremendous dust generally.

"Take that bull out of the way," shouted Nash.

"Proceed with thy elephant," was the reply.

"If you don't take that bull away, he'll get hurt," continued Nash, approaching, while the bull redoubled his furious demonstrations.

"Don't trouble thyself about the bull, but proceed with thy elephant," retorted Shavy, rubbing his hands with delight at the prospect of a scrimmage—the old fellow having great confidence in the invincibility of his bull, which was really the terror of the whole country around.

Tippoo Saib came on with his uncouth, shambling gait; the bull lowered his head and made a charge directly at the elephant.

Old Tippoo, without even pausing in his march, gave his trunk a sweep, catching the bull on the side, crushing in his ribs with his enormous tusks, and then raised him about thirty feet in the air—the bull striking upon his head as he came down, breaking his neck and killing him instantly.

"I'm afraid your bull has bent his neck a little," shouted Nash as he passed on.

"Bent!" cried old Shavy, with a troubled look at his dead bull; "thy elephant is too heavy for my beast—but thee will not make so much out of the operation as thee supposes. I was going to take my family to thy show, but I'll see thee and thy show in Jericho before I go one step; and now thee may proceed with thy elephant."—Sat. Even'g Post (Phil.)

RABELAIS believed, after his fashion, in the infallibility of the Pope. He had been threatened with the Inquisition for abandoning his monastic vows, and on a visit to Paul III., to whom he made himself acceptable by his wit and gaiety, his Holiness expressed a wish to grant him a favor. He, in reply, begged to be excommunicated. Being asked why he preferred so strange a request, he accounted for it by saying that some very honest gentlemen of his acquaintance, in France, had been burned, and finding it a common saying in Italy, when a fagot would not take fire, that it was excommunicated by the Pope's own mouth, he wished to be rendered incombustible by the same process!—Universe.

Geneva, where Calvin lived and commenced his preaching, is, at the present time, a very irreligious place. Stores are open, business is going on, and pleasure is unconfined on Sunday afternoon. There is a large class of religionists known as Latitudinarians. They openly deny the Trinity, and advocate doctrines considerably in advance of our Unitarians. The "minds" of the people are mainly devoted to watch making. Geneva is the greatest watch market in the world. Switzerland annually makes 150,000 watches. The highest wages paid to the best watch makers is 2½ francs per day.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"The only fault I find with your paper is, that there is not enough of it; and I rise from the perusal of a number feeling like the fox when he had devoured Chanticleer.—'It was very good, but I have not had enough yet.' I will endeavor to send you some more names from this place. I am preparing the way for THE INDEX as fast as I can in my public preaching and private conversation. From my own experience in conversation with professed Christians, I am fully convinced that there are many prominent members in 'good and regular standing in Orthodox churches' that are ready for a 'change,' having lost all faith in traditional dogmas. I believe you will credit me with having some—yes, pretty strong faith in Free Religion, when I tell you (boasting excluded) that I left a popular and wealthy church with a fair salary, and, having a large family to support, have gone out, 'not knowing whither I went,' and at present have not the promise of $1.00 by way of salary, but am preaching for humanity and truth's sake, working with my hands to provide things honest in the sight of all men."

—"In 3rd column, 4th page, of your No. 14 your wonderfully clear-headed editor says:—'Since that day (23d March '63) our theology has greatly changed,—our faith in the war and in the cause for which it was waged, not a whit.' Without wishing to bride any one for honest difference in views,—for 'true liberty is in agreeing that we may differ, and agree in spite of differing,'—I hope I may be permitted, as long a Southern participant in that horrid war of brothers, to express the earnest hope that so highly gifted a man as Mr. Abbot, may, long before another seven years roll round, cease to glory in any 'cause' the end of which may have been attained by violence and carnage, to say nothing of his glorying in the means,—may have 'greatly changed' too, in that respect."

—"Send me a few copies of No. 17 of THE INDEX, the one containing the 'Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian.' There is, I believe, only one Free Religionist in B— besides myself; but I think that letter cannot fail to open the eyes of some of the blind. We have many here who will not permit themselves to read anything that is not strictly orthodox (?), or in other words which is not in strict conformity to the religious belief which they have already formed, and in which they have rested from childhood. With such persons it is almost useless to talk, for they are wilfully blind. I should like very much to see another article in your columns, from the pen of R. S. D."

—"I desire to thank you for THE INDEX. We have many papers claiming to be free religious organs, but yours is the only one I know of that is really so. It is cheering to find one man who is not afraid to tell the truth about his own belief, and at the same time to represent those who disagree with him fairly. You have many unknown but sincere friends who are ready to aid you in the work you have undertaken. As soon as I have a little leisure to attend to it, I hope to aid Dr. — in increasing the circulation of THE INDEX in this city and vicinity."

—"Enclosed you will find the balance of my subscription for the year. I am poor as far as this world's goods are concerned, but confess that morally and intellectually I would be poorer, if I did not have THE INDEX to read. I am a spiritualist, and have thought that this ism would absorb all others; but there is ample room for it in free religion, and we begin to feel and embrace the principles taught by it."

—"I am better pleased with it than any reform paper I have ever taken."

PICTURES FROM OVID:

IX. NIOBE AND HER DAUGHTERS.

She ceased to speak, when from the twanging string
The fatal shaft shot forth on feathered wing.
Bold from despair, she stood yet undismayed,
While all around their trembling fear betrayed.
In robes of sable hue, the sister band
Around the biers with hair dishevelled stand.
One plucks an arrow from her wounded breast,
Then, dying, on her brother sinks to rest;
Another strives to soothe her mother's grief,
But soon in death are hushed her accents brief;
Pierced by a dart unseen, she falls and dies,—
Her lips yet parted, lo, her spirit flies.
One seeks in vain to flee the unerring steel,
In vain another would herself conceal.
In life united, death cannot divide
This from her brother, on whose breast she died;
Another still stands motionless with fear.
Lo, six have perished by a doom severe—
One yet remains; and now, with anguish wild,
The unhappy mother strives to shield her child
With all her robes and with her bosom bare,
Thoughtless of self and frantie with despair.
"Spare, spare my last-born, leave me one!" she cried,
"O leave me one! All, all the rest have died!"

The Index.

JUNE 25, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted, and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

Our contributors will, we trust, not misconceive the delay or non appearance of their articles as indicating an unwillingness to give them a fair hearing. We are precisely as willing to print criticisms as commendations; and are pleased that others should judge our opinions as freely as we judge theirs. But there are various reasons for the appearance or non-appearance of communications which only the practical manager of a newspaper could appreciate. Our chief lack now, however, is that of room; and we cannot venture to enlarge the paper at present.

"CHRISTIAN CHARITY."

A Jewish congregation in Boston makes the following appeal:—

"The 'Congregation Mishcan Israel,' of this city, propose to build an house unto the Lord their God; but being poor, though Jews, they respectfully appeal to the liberality of the Christians to aid them. No Christian can read the first five verses of the 9th chapter of Romans, without a feeling of kindness towards those 'who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory,' etc., 'of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came.' S. K. Cohen, 76 Union Street, is chairman of the Building Committee."

We are pleased to see that the Methodist Zion's Herald is liberal enough to second this appeal, though in a somewhat ungracious and patronizing way:—

"Let all believers in Christ read the eleventh of Romans, and help these heirs of the same promise, even in their shadowy state of faith. Such gifts will open their eyes, as Christ did their ancestors."

We observe, however, that this exhortation is based on Biblical grounds, and not on the simple claims of human brotherhood.

THE GORDIAN KNOT OF PHILOSOPHY.

Under the heading—"Freedom and Necessity," there will be found among our communications this morning a very able and noteworthy article, to which we offer the following remarks in reply. For convenience of reference, we have numbered the chief paragraphs of the article, and shall correspondingly number our own.

1. The theory of spiritual freedom is regarded by the writer as incompatible with the fact of moral growth, for the reason that the growth "is to be relied on." Uniformity of growth presupposes a necessary law, whereas freedom would result in irregularity rather than uniformity of growth.

But what is the fact? Is moral growth, either in the individual or in society, so continuous and uninterrupted as to be explicable only by absolute necessity? Is it, in this sense, "to be relied on?" We think not. On the contrary, the persons who seem to be morally most excellent, occasionally fall into moral aberrations which interrupt the uniformity of growth. The moral development of the race is likewise subject to checks and perversions, to oscillations between a higher and lower moral state, which seem unaccountable on the theory of a necessary "growing towards perfection." The word degeneration means too much to be forgotten in this connection. The actual facts seem more in harmony with the theory of freedom within limits (we of course do not argue for absolute or unconditioned freedom) than with that of absolute necessity.

2. We are not sure that we understand the second point. Morals will certainly be a part of universal law, if (as we believe) the primary law of morals is that of spiritual freedom; and will thus be "related" to the entire system of Nature.

3. Our friend has very candidly stated here the chief objection to his own theory; and we wish he had considered it at length. "Morals without freedom" we should certainly judge to be impossible. But "law with freedom" suggests no such impossibility to our mind, because we conceive freedom to exist only to a very limited extent. It is not absolute freedom, but the equal reality of freedom and necessity in different spheres, in which we believe. If man uses his freedom wisely and conscientiously, he morally "grows," i. e. improves; otherwise, he deteriorates. Just as physical strength depends on voluntary exercise of the muscles, so moral strength depends on voluntary exercise of the conscience. In either case, the exercise is unimpelled; but if it is taken, then growth necessarily results. No freedom there, but only in the previous choice whether to exercise or not.

"It is what I am, not what I deserve, that is of consequence." Exactly,—but what you are depends on what you deserve. If you deserve respect, you are noble; if otherwise, the reverse. What test but that of "merit and demerit" can possibly be applied, in order to determine moral character? What is "merit," but the having freely obeyed the moral ideal? What "demerit," but the having freely served passion or selfish interest instead?

4. "Nothing has real value but obedience of law." True; but this very "obedience" presupposes freedom,—the double alternative of obedience or disobedience. The theory of necessity can know nothing of this distinction. Who or what can disobey a necessary law? Everything, on this theory, is obedience,—all actions have equal moral value, that is, no moral value.

It is true, as suggested, that the theory of necessity reduces the determination of moral character to a mere question of mechanics or physics,—in other words, entirely eliminates from it the moral question. Wisdom and virtue are thus logically analyzed into the accompanying phenomena of certain molecular motions, as sensible light and heat accompany certain chemical combinations. But we regard the moral question as the whole question.

5. Virtue is beauty, and nothing more, on the necessarian theory. The sentiments they excite in the mind of the beholder are doubtless akin. But they differ fundamentally, if the theory of freedom be true. It is at our own option to be virtuous or vicious; it is not at our own option to be beautiful or ugly. It is the element of choice which distinguishes virtue from beauty; for it is the peculiarity of virtue to be the one creation of man. The beautiful have Nature to thank for their beauty; the virtuous (if virtue exists) have themselves to thank alone.

6. The petulant boy outgrows, perhaps, his petulance. If the necessarian theory be true, he is bound logically to outgrow also his indignation at sight of wrong, his discontent with himself for doing wrong,—in short, every sentiment distinctively moral. Whether man would be improved by such "growth," is another question. The only moral growth we covet is the continual strengthening of the love of right and hate of wrong, and the ever increasing vigor of a will trained to do the one and avoid the other.

7. "The ideal man," to one born with fierce passions and an inherited bias to evil, will be a warrior, until through conflict peace has come; but he will be serene, when "the devils" are "cast out." If the devils are in, is it not best to put them out? Merit is not to be measured by the struggle it costs to get them out, except so far as it expresses an intense purpose to realize the ideal life. But this purpose is even stronger in him who has no need to fight. There is more merit (that is, a higher title to respect) in the man who loves virtue so intensely that vice to him has no charms, than in the man who is distracted in his allegiance, and has to conquer the temptation to disloyalty by a severe battle with himself. The latter wins, perhaps, more sympathy, which is born of our own weakness; but it is a great mistake to count him more meritorious.

Thus we are not, after all, driven to reduce man either to a "machine," or to a "contradiction." The facts are on the side of spiritual freedom; it is certain speculations only (scarcely touched upon by our friend) that are on the side of necessity.

MR. WASSON'S POSITION.

In his recent anti-creed speech at Boston, which took so many by surprise, Dr. Bellows made the following statements:—

"Suppose you cut off by your creed (as you must) either side of the denomination; suppose you cut off the older conservative side, and by cutting them off leave your body without spiritual eyes—for you would to a very great extent—what would you have to cut off next? The so-called 'Free Religionists,' by any creed that this body is prepared to accept. Suppose you cut them off; what have you left? God knows I do not like many of their statements, but I am glad to have them in the Unitarian body. I believe a large part of the spiritual life of the denomination lies in the very men whose theological opinions many of us most utterly reject, and I should like to point you to one little fact. You would cut off among the very first the man who has given the fullest answer in the Unitarian denomination to Mr. Abbot's position of denial or declination of the faith in a personal God and in the Christianity of a living Church—and that is Mr. Wasson; and if there be any man who has tackled the subject of Mr. Abbot's opinions and mauled them with a sledge-hammer to be felt to the end of the question, it is the drubbing that gentleman's views have received in the last Radical at the hands of Mr. D. A. Wasson. Let us keep these men among us; don't let us drive away any of the men who for any reason are in their own consciences and in their own hearts able to work with us and willing to work with us."

For the sake of information, we would inquire,—Does Mr. Wasson accept the position thus assigned him within "the Unitarian denomination," or has he been unintentionally misrepresented by Dr. Bellows in this respect?

ERRATA.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Friend,—I seldom trouble myself about typographical errors, but wish to correct one or two that entirely alter the meaning of passages in the report of my remarks at Mt. Auburn on Decoration Day, which you reprint from the Boston Journal. The errors belong to the original report.

In the third paragraph, for "multiplying wrath," read "multiplying wealth." And for "sweet Auburn" read "Sweet Auburn,"—the name by which "Mount Auburn" was known in my boyhood, before it was used as a cemetery.

In the last paragraph but two, in the passage "it is our reward that we can stand to-day among these graves and yet think that we survive," read, "and yet not blush that we survive,"—quite a different sentiment.

Yours truly,

T. W. HIGGINSON.

NEWPORT, R. I., June 11, 1870.

[We thank Col. Higginson for these corrections. The word "wrath" was so evidently a misreport (though we could not guess the word originally used), that we allowed it to remain as we found it, trusting that our readers would credit it to the reporter's opacity. The word "Auburn" was "autumn" in the report, and we are glad that our conjectural emendation was correct as far as it went. The exceeding beauty of the address, and our desire to reprint it before it became too late, must be our apology for not writing to Col. Higginson for the corrections that should have been made.—Ed.]

THE SOUL.

TOLEDO, June 1st, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Experience teaches us that all we see and know of ourselves which in itself is immaterial,—as the reason, will, conscience, thought,—in fact, all the faculties of the mind which are usually ascribed to the soul,—is the result of physical forces, the working of the brain. Most truly you say, in your remarks on the article headed "The Other Side," in No. 20, that experience does not teach the impossibility of mind independent of brain, since experience of the impossible is an absurdity. But if all the phenomena of our being are the result of physical causes, what place does the "soul" hold in this organism? Under such conditions, it must be latent. But the "soul" is the being, and the body is simply the dwelling house; ergo, it cannot be latent. If we should ascribe to it those faculties which are the result of the brain, it must be ever acting. If the "soul" (admitting there is one) can return to earth after death, as the Spiritualist claims, why cannot it re-animate that body it has just left (when that body is perfectly sound, as is very often the case in drowning), since

"No soul with mortal breath Ever truly longed for death."

I doubt not that any one would do so, if he could; and why not? If there is a "soul," surely it contains life, and, in fact, is life and much more beside. If, then, individual life or "soul" is immortal, why can it not re-animate the body? If life is other than the result of physical forces, surely physical forces can not drive it away against all its dearest inclinations. If you can give any rational reason for the belief of a "soul," when all the known phenomena of our being are the result of physical causes, I would very thankfully receive them.

Yours truly,

DELTA.

[Our thoughtful young correspondent asks questions which it takes a wiser head than ours to answer. We use the word "soul" simply as the name of that which manifests itself in the intellectual, moral, affectional, and volitional phenomena of consciousness. What it is, we do not know; and we use the term without wishing to imply any metaphysical theory whatever.

It is not proved that "all the phenomena of our being are the result of physical causes." Brain (or, more properly, the nervous system) is the present condition of these phenomena; but it can not be proved that it is their necessary cause. This distinction is too often ignored. Confident assertions on this subject which will not bear the test of exact thought, are too common. It is wise to leave some questions open. If materialism says that consciousness is only the result of organized matter, idealism replies that matter is itself known only by our own sensations. It is just as impossible to prove the existence of "matter" as it is to prove the existence of "soul." No man can without presumption affirm that consciousness is the result of brain, until he has shown how merely physical changes can become feeling and thought. He cannot do this,—he gets out of his depth at once. We know that we think and feel and act, while alive in these bodies; but whether we can think, feel, and act without them, we do not know. A cheerful hope is wiser than either fear, despair, or the "conceit of knowledge without the reality."—Ed.]

THE POPE A RADICAL IN SPITE OF HIMSELF.

BOSTON, June 9, 1870.

MR. EDITOR:—Welcome to our good brother the Pope, who feels and proclaims himself to be infallible. Welcome to his brethren who declare that he is infallible. He wishes all to believe in him, that is, to believe as he does. But what does he believe? Plainly this. He believes or has faith in himself, in his own enlightened conscience and reason, which God has given him. Would he not have others believe the same,—have faith in themselves?

Pius IX believes in what he thinks to be right; and I believe in what I think to be right.

Wherein do we differ? The governing principle is the same.

Respectfully yours,

J. H. BOWDITCH.

FREEDOM AND NECESSITY.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—Your leading article in THE INDEX of May 14th, entitled "Conscience," fairly offers battle on the old ground,—a field which I suppose many think has been already fought over needlessly often.

Your manifesto is given in your first line, stating the absolute condition of moral life to be spiritual freedom.

This is the logical conflict of ages. I think it is destined to become a practical conflict also. Each succeeding war over it will at least do this,—it will reduce the propositions on both sides to simpler terms, and thus in time end the conflict, either by showing palpably to all the entire irreconcilability of the two sides, or else by reconciling them. The latter is my most cherished hope—though somewhat dim as to method.

In the article referred to, you act, I think, as commander of one of the opposing armies, and fight under the conditions of your manifesto, not as seated on an Olympus of Optimism, lifted above the smoke and seeing both armies and the movements of all. My figure may be defective, but I suppose that when morally lifted, we can see through obscurities.

To leave metaphor (which grows unwieldy), I will recall your 37th affirmation:—"The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man," &c.

1. The growing out of the possession of evil tendencies and into the possession of good tendencies, must be a growing towards perfection. Is spiritual freedom a condition of this growth? If yes,—then how reconcile the fact that the growth is to be relied on? I mean, how can there be such uniformity to anything when the condition to which it is subject is freedom? A conditioned freedom is, of course, no freedom. Our consciousness (at least our practice) here seems at war with it.

2. Morals seem as wholly under the divine law as material nature; we universally so think of it; we feel it to be related; and if growth and civilization bear with them one thought, hope, feeling, more warm and strengthening than all others, it is this sense of relationship. Yet how can freedom be related? How can morals be part of the divine law, if it rests on freedom?

3. I fancy I hear you say, "How can there be morals without freedom? And what are you doing with the word morals, if you question freedom?"

These imagined questions I must leave unanswered for the present, and still ask permission to use the old words for awhile. Yet are there not the same difficulties met in using the word law with freedom, as morals without it? We speak of moral growth; growth is a movement step by step; endless growth implies that all differences are differences of degree. It would seem safe to say that this is so in morals, yet the theory is fatal to that particular kind of freedom which shall give moral responsibility.

Harmony, Relationship, Growth,—these are the important words, not merit and demerit.

It is what I am, not what I deserve, that is of real consequence.

How high in the scale was the act absolutely,—not how high was the act considering how low was the actor?

4. Let a little simplicity into this complication of freedom.

Nothing has real value but obedience of law. This is wisdom, and virtue, and all. That it should bring to the soul rest, peace, courage, love, joy, ecstasy, rapture, is as inexplicable as it is that color, music, perfume, flavor, should be borne to the senses by the monotonous vehicle of mere motion. Why? How? is unanswerable; but the analogy is, I think, a powerful argument.

To discover that the mechanics of color differ only in degree from the mechanics of the revolving arms of a wind-mill, does not render less beautiful to us the tint of a rose or an emerald.

5. You say,—"Virtue, like beauty, is ultimate." Are they not absolutely alike, and but differing names for the same essence? If ultimate, how can either be modified by any action of the will? How subject to it? How related to man, save as giver of joy in proportion to his capacity to receive?

We have had, and still have words such as mercy, benevolence, charity,—yet justice includes all that is best in them all, and thereby implies the still finer truth that harmony is the underlying law, that the universe is in tune.

6. You say,—"Unless the profligate, &c., violates an inward law which he had power to obey, then the moral indignation he excites is as irrational as the impulse which makes the boy with a bumped head turn and kick the door which bumped it."

The boy grows out of the latter as he comes to see things more nearly in their real relationship, and may not grow also lift us out of the former by the same process?

I think this is the tendency of things. The management of prisons to-day, compared with that of the past century, seems to indicate this. There is less practical recognition of crime as guilt, and more as disease. This is merely one instance. Tendencies are all we can hope to discover, as indicating laws of this kind; growth is too slow to give full evidence, save over long periods.

7. Again—This ideal! The ideal man! Is he one battling with demons, though never so successfully? Or is he not serene, with all the devils cast out? Surely so long as one remains, he is not the ideal; for the bad, to be there at all, must be in him, and part of him. Yet without the bad, how can he be good? I mean meritoriously good? Can this important conclusion be the true conclusion? If so, then all reductions of life and its dignities are not on the necessitarian side of the argument, and reducing man to a machine is more than matched by reducing him to a contradiction. Of the two I prefer the machine.

THE "COLDNESS" OF NATURAL RELIGION.

FRIEND ABBOT:—It is alleged against Natural Religion that in the worship it suggests it is cold and cheerless, and void of that warm enthusiasm which characterizes the worship, and especially the revival meetings, of the orthodox. Even Unitarianism, which all evangelical sects regard as an ice-house, where they first freeze religion to death, and then keep it in solemn state like the body of a deceased monarch, affects to roll up its sanctimonious eyes at the coldness of the Free Religionists.

I admit the marked difference between the worship of the Church and that which we celebrate in the great Temple of Nature. And there is a most excellent reason for it,—the same reason which explains the frantic, tearful agitation of a car-load of passengers who have broken through a bridge, and have been rescued from a watery grave by the hair of their heads, and a train upon another and safer road, where all are calm and contented, because they have been exposed to no danger whatever and travelling pleasantly to the place of their destination. The two systems of religion are in all respects diametrically opposite to each other, and no wonder that their worship should be entirely different.

The Church people believe that there is in the other world, from which we are separated only by the brittle thread of life, a lake of fire and brimstone into which all are plunged who do not believe in the name of Jesus Christ. Hence they preach the "Gospel" at home, and send missionaries to the "heathen" to save them; for it is written that there is none other name under heaven among men whereby a human being, civilized or savage, can be saved from the fires of this lake, except that of Jesus. They believe that these eternal burnings have been kindled by God himself, and that the victims are his own children! They believe that the Church is the only ark of safety from the deluge of divine wrath, and that the clergy are the agents to keep the door and drag the people in. A conversion or a revival, which is conversion on a large scale, means snatching from the Devil's grasp one or more who otherwise would be doomed to burn forever, to the glory of God's justice. Hence the clergy like to describe in glowing terms to the people the dangers to which they were exposed, and the obligations they are under to Jesus for his vicarious sacrifice. No wonder at the fiery zeal displayed by speaker and hearers.

Now the worshippers in the great Temple of Nature reject every jot and tittle of all this, and regard it as sheer superstition. The God they adore is as different from the orthodox one as the bright and glorious Day is from the hideous, dark Night. In their system there is no hell but the loss of self-respect, and the reproaches of conscience which lash the transgressor even till he reaches the threshold of the future state. This is hell enough, one would think, to satisfy the most malicious fiend in the universe. But it has a place in our system, for the flames are of a man's own kindling. Our God is our loving Father.

er, not a hateful despot whom we propitiate by the blood of innocence. We don't feel the need of any salvation, because we have no fears of any wrath to come. We don't fear death as an evil, but regard it as a natural event, as much so as birth—a transition from a cramped to a freer life, from a region of comparative darkness to one of light. Our Temple where we worship is a vast building not made by human hands. The canopy over our heads is its ceiling. The earth carpeted with green is its floor. The intervening atmosphere is the home of the lightning, and those other mysterious forces which we study, with all other science, as exhibitions of the Power, and Wisdom, and Goodness of the Great Architect. As we see the divine love manifested to us in all the arrangements made for our happiness, if we will only obey the laws of our being, our hearts glow with love in return. But our love is quiet and deep, as all lasting love is, not frantic and ephemeral. Then we have music, the music of the planets, forever singing as they shine, and often music both of the voice and the instrument in the great congregation. Our Sunday is indeed a day of rest and relaxation from the necessary but wholesome toils of the week; but our religious teachers are not polemical dogmatists, feeding the people on the husks of controversy. They do not roar like bulls of Bashan, and paw the valley for fight; nor butt each other like rams on the mountains of Gilboa. These exercises appropriately belong to the priesthood of the churches. The knowledge of God through the works of his hands, and the knowledge of man and his destiny, as the child of God; and the lessons of history for nations,—these are the rich themes of our pulpits; and oftentimes, as we luxuriate in these sanctuary privileges, our eyes are filled with tears of holy joy, and our hearts with gratitude, that we are the emancipated Sons and Daughters of the Lord Almighty, instead of the poor trembling caitiffs we once were, when enclosed by the grovelling superstitions of the Church.

Compare the worshippers of the Temple with those in the synagogues of the sects. Of the first, how serene, how intelligent, what self-respect, what conscious freedom from all fear of death or its consequences, what charity to the unfortunate, what kindness to those who differ in opinion with us, what eager and laborious study of the grand laws of the universe whereby God has made himself known, what cheerfulness and quiet happiness!

Of the second class, their religion has stamped its features of gloom and terror upon the faces of the worshippers. It has affected the very tones of the voice taking away the natural, out-spoken manliness, and substituting the baby-whine of cant and snivel. It has converted them into a crowd of cowards, acknowledging in their prayers that they are the legitimate children of the Devil, and only adopted into the family of God, and held by a tie that is very brittle, and liable at any temptation to break and let them down again to their natural condition. Take away from the preachers of the synagogues these three ideas—the dreadfulness of death as the event which settles the destiny of the soul forever,—the sanctity of the Sabbath as the critical day of grace and opportunity,—and the torments of hell-fire, with a Devil to rouse up the flames eternally, and they lose their hold upon the people, and they themselves die of inanition. These ideas, false and grovelling as they are, form the bond of union which keeps the ranks of the orthodox unbroken, and furnish the clergy with their chief stock in trade. It is not the beauty of holiness that keeps the devotees of the sects in the path of duty, and allures them God-ward. It is the fear of hell which frightens them away from a course they would otherwise pursue.

The worshippers of the Temple are strangers to all fear. They are led by the silken cord of love to the high places of thought, whence they look abroad into the future with the sweet conviction of the poet Whittier, that God, our dear Father, will do for us all the very best he can.

Reader, which of these two religions is the more ennobling and elevating? BEZA.

IS CHRISTIANITY ABSOLUTE RELIGION?

BY THOS. M'CLINTOCK.

In the foregoing articles we have seen the positive assurance of their prophets of the perpetuity of the Hebrew government and Mosaic Law, and the tenacity with which they clung to the idea that a temporal deliverer would be sent, who should "restore the kingdom of Israel." Even down to the period of the destruction of Jerusalem, this dream appears to have been unremittently indulged. Although the race of living prophets had been extinct for more than four hundred years, they found in the writings of the former, and in particular in the 14th chapter of Zachariah, apparently written in contemplation of that event, sufficient to stimulate their zeal and fanaticism. He tells them "Jehovah will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle, and the city shall be taken and the houses rifled, &c., and half of the city shall go forth into captivity," but "the residue of the people" shall not "be cut off from the city." "Then shall Jehovah go forth and fight against those nations." The enemies of Israel would of course succumb. "And Jehovah shall be King over all the earth. In that day there shall be one Jehovah, and his name one." Jerusalem should be exalted and inhabited in her place. "Men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited." "Jehovah will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem.

Their flesh shall consume away; their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue in their mouth. A great tumult from Jehovah shall be among them, and they shall lay hold every one of his neighbor, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbor. And Judah also shall fight at Jerusalem; and the wealth of all the heathen round about shall be gathered together (fall to the Jews), gold and silver and apparel, in great abundance. Every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. And whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth to Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, upon them shall be no rain. This shall be the punishment of Egypt and all nations that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles."

Alas! what a striking picture did the prophet strangely draw, not of those who fought Jews alone, but of the Jews themselves. "A prodigious conflux," says Tacitus, "poured in from all quarters, and among them the most bold and turbulent spirits of the nation. The city was distracted by internal division. They had three armies and as many generals. The outward walls were defended by Simon. John commanded the middle precinct. Eleazar kept the Temple. The three parties quarrelled among themselves. Battles were fought within the walls. The factions that distracted the city, it is said, attacked one another with a degree of animosity more inveterate than they ever showed in battle with the Romans. Thus truly, "the hand of every one rose up against the hand of his neighbor." Under color of performing a sacrifice, John sent a band of assassins and cut off Eleazar and his whole party in one general massacre. Simon, at one time, persuading himself that Titus was about to raise the siege, and fearing that Matthias, an aged priest who had been instrumental in raising him to his bad eminence, would stand in the way of his ambitious designs for sovereignty, put him to death, together with his three sons; while his partisans "drenched their daggers in the blood of all who dared to lament the miseries of their country." The cruelties perpetrated by John and Simon indicate a degree of hardened profligacy that is inconceivable, and the story of horrid crimes committed in the Temple by the Jews, during the contest, is sickening. In short, the history of the war "presents a scene of blood and carnage unequalled in the records of any other nation." Their "folly in provoking the vengeance of a great and warlike nation, and their internal discords, party rage and madness, conspired with a foreign force" to complete the utter extinguishment of their own nationality. A city so strong by nature and art that it was deemed almost impregnable, and a Temple the admiration of the world, were levelled to the ground. Thus fulfilling to the letter the prediction of Jesus, pronounced forty years before, regarding the latter, that not one stone should be left on another.

Titus, the Roman general, naturally mild and humane in his disposition, desirous of stopping the effusion of blood, and wishing even to save to them their sacred Temple, repeatedly offered them pardon and favorable terms of capitulation. But the Jewish leaders spurned every offer, and obliged him to construct battering engines and munitions, that enabled him to reach every point of the complex and powerful defences; and finally the destruction of life, of all classes, became immense; so that Josephus, who was with Titus, and endeavored, in vain, to use his influence with his Jewish brethren, computes that not less than eleven hundred thousand of that devoted people perished in the siege.* Well might Jesus, in view of the clairvoyant perception given him of the sad impending catastrophe, exclaim, with tearful eyes; "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent to thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, but ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate."

"They were taught by their false prophets," says the historian, "that the Lord of hosts would fight their battles, and deliver them from a foreign yoke. The predictions that relate to the coming of a Messiah, were not understood as promising a redeemer to free the world from a bondage of sin; but, as Tacitus observes, they expected a heroic conqueror, who should march at the head of their armies, and extend the dominion of the East over all foreign nations."

Let us now look at another aspect of the subject. There is a class of passages that occasionally occur in the records of the Hebrew prophets, of a character very different from their general utterances, and which can only be regarded as descriptive of a SPIRITUAL MESSIAH OR CHRIST. Take the following as a sample:—Isaiah II, 2, "It shall come to pass in the last days, (viz: Gospel times, in contradistinction from the Legal,) that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow into it. And many people shall go and say Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths. . . . And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." Nearly the same is repeated in Micah, iv.

*For further particulars of the thrilling events of this terrible war, see History of Tacitus, Book V, and the ample Appendix, by another hand.

Such passages express the true and natural fruit of Love, of brotherly kindness, of the social human sympathies in their highest condition of exercise. In other words, they imply and comprehend a Spiritual Messiah, in the three senses of "Anointer," "Anointing," and "Anointed,"—all of which are common in New Testament usage; and are all three illustrated in the case of Jesus, in the Synagogue at Nazareth, when, the Book of Isaiah being handed him, he read to them the place where it was written, "The Spirit (anointing) of Jehovah (the anointer) is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor," &c. And in Jeremiah xxxi, 31 and seq., we have described the highest ideal of the true Christ, and his office, as Teacher, without respect of persons, of the only certain knowledge of God, and the blessings resulting: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, when I took them by the hand to bring them out of Egypt, &c. But this shall be the covenant that I will make with them, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and his brother, saying, know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least to the greatest of them."

But nowhere, perhaps, in the Old Testament, is the Spiritual Messianic doctrine more beautifully illustrated than in that very remarkable production, the Book of Daniel—whether it be apocryphal, as able critics deem, or canonical, as old theology improperly teaches of that and other human works. Daniel, interpreting Nebuchadnezzar's dream, describes four great kingdoms or empires, which are understood to be the Chaldean, the Medo-Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman empire, each of which was established and sustained by the sword, and, in their order, superseded and swallowed up by the other—thus exemplifying the declaration of Jesus, "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." As superseding these, in striking contrast, Daniel describes (ch. 2, 44,) a fourth kingdom, to be "set up by the God of heaven," which should never be destroyed, but which would "break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and stand forever." The character and progress of this latter kingdom is described (ver. 34, 35,) under the metaphor of "a stone cut out without hands, which smote the image." "Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them. And the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." The description is significant at once of spirituality, durability, and power. The stone was "cut out without hands." It would not be the work of human ingenuity, but of "the God of Heaven." Constituted of eternal and immutable principles, which have their origin in infinite God, it cannot change or decline. Not having in it, like governments established by finite men wandering from the fountain of Divine Wisdom, any seeds or germ of dissolution, it will "stand forever"; advancing progressively till it fills the whole earth, enclosing all humanity in its portals, as the children of one common Parent, receiving continually the "unction" of his spirit, and living in the sunshine of his presence.

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY.—The schema of the dogma of infallibility, which is now under discussion in the Ecumenical Council, has been distributed in printed form. It contains five canons, as follows:—

1. If any one should say that the Episcopal chair of the Roman Church is not the true and real infallible chair of Blessed Peter, or that it has not been divinely chosen by God as the most solid, indefectible, and incorruptible rock of the whole Christian Church, let him be anathema.

2. If any one should say that there exists in the world another infallible chair of the truth of the Gospel of Christ our Lord, distinct and separate from the chair of blessed Peter, let him be anathema.

3. If any one should deny that the divine magisterium of the chair of blessed Peter is necessary to the true way of eternal salvation for all men, whether unfaithful or faithful, whether laymen or bishops, let him be anathema.

4. If any one should say that each Roman Pontiff, legitimately elected, is not by divine right the successor of blessed Peter, even in the gift of the infallibility of magisterium, and should deny to any of them the prerogative of infallibility for teaching the church the word of God pure from all corruption and error, let him be anathema.

5. If any one should say that general councils are established by God in the church as a power of feeding the divine flock in the word of faith superior to the Roman Pontiff, or equal to him, or necessary by divine institution in order that the magisterium of the Roman Bishop should be preserved infallible, let him be anathema.—Boston Journal.

The Revolution (ultra woman's rights) complains that the bitterest opposition to the woman suffrage movement comes from the religious press, and especially from the "evangelical." If this is so, it is presumptive evidence that the Revolution is on the wrong track, that's all! What would Warrington, and the Revolution, and the radicals do, if they could not fight the poor evangelicals!—Boston Watchman and Reflector.

THE ANNUAL REPORT.

We wish to call special attention to the new provision, made at the late Annual Meeting of the Association, with regard to the printed Report of the proceedings of the meeting. It was voted, on recommendation of the Executive Committee, that hereafter the Report shall be sent free to all members of the Association whose annual fee for membership ($1.00) has been paid within a year, or who have contributed any sum beyond that to the funds of the Association,—provided that the Secretary have their names and post-office address. In accordance with this vote the pamphlet Report this year, as soon as printed, will be sent to all persons whose names, with their post-office address, are on the Secretary's (or Treasurer's) record as having given one dollar or more to the Association within twelve months,—or, we will say, since the first of July, 1869, as we hope to have this year's Report out by the first of next month. And all persons who shall now, or at any time during the year to come, make themselves members of the Association by sending one dollar or more with their address to the Secretary, will receive the benefits of this provision, and have a copy of the Report sent to them without further expense. A number of persons have already sent their names with the membership fee, and will receive the Report by mail when ready for distribution. We shall be glad to receive the addresses of others on the same conditions. Those persons who contributed in response to our circular of last November, will have the Report sent to them. The pamphlet this year will not be inferior in interest and value to that of any preceding year. In one respect it will be of greater permanent worth, since it will contain more papers that were carefully prepared. It will contain all the Addresses of the morning and evening sessions in Tremont Temple in full, and an abstract of the afternoon's discussion. Though it is to be sent to members free, it will also be for sale, as heretofore, to those who do not care to become members. But the price is not yet fixed. It will certainly not be more than fifty cents.

FROM A DISCOURSE BY KESHUB CHUNDER SEN ON "GREAT MEN."

Life alone can give life; and, above all, the life of heaven-appointed prophets. It is what they have actually done that makes us understand the loftiness and sublimity which humanity is capable of, and impels us to attain that loftiness and sublimity. . . .

Let not our homage, however, be exclusively confined to any one of them, and withheld from the rest. We must honor all of them, unbiased by local influences, party feeling, or sectarian bigotry. It is the want of this catholic spirit, it is the evil of awarding exclusive honor to particular prophets, that has filled the religious world with jealousies, hatred, and sanguinary strife, and made their followers plunge the dagger of brutal animosity into each other's breast. In fact, it is this which has mainly originated sectarianism and multiplied hostile churches. In many cases, again, such exclusive honor has been carried so far as to assume the form of deification. Struck with amazement at the superhuman character of their prophet, men have, in the blind zeal of extreme devotion, exalted him to divinity and identified him with the Godhead; and while adoring their one prophet as the God of salvation, they have condemned all other prophets as false prophets, who lead their followers to perdition. It is indeed painful to contemplate the two-fold evil of such sectarian bigotry. Man, mortal man, with all his frailties and shortcomings, is deified and worshipped; and to him is rendered that supreme adoration which belongs to God alone! This idolatrous bending of the knee before man is an insult to Heaven, and an audacious violation of that entire loyalty and allegiance to God which is demanded of every true believer. Like every other form of idolatry, it is a treason against God, which pollutes the heart and degrades the soul. On the other hand, equally mischievous, if not equally sacrilegious, is the rancor with which every prophet is hated and cursed by the followers of another prophet. Every religious sect shuts up truth, inspiration and holiness, in its own narrow church, and looks upon the life and labors of its prophets as the only saving dispensation of Providence; while all prophets and truths that lie beyond its church are condemned as impostors and lies. This is making God the God of a clan, a country, and an epoch, instead of, as He is, the God of all mankind, of all space, and of all time.

Each of the prophets came into the world as a messenger of God, bearing a distinct message of glad tidings which he contributed to the cause of religious enlightenment and progress. We must, then, freely honor all of them, and gratefully accept from each what he has to deliver, instead of binding ourselves as slaves to any particular person as the only chosen prophet of God. For "at sundry times and in divers manners God spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets." And though Jesus Christ, the Prince of Prophets, effected greater wonders, and did infinitely more good to the world than the others, and deserves therefore our profoundest reverence, we must not neglect that chain, or any single link in that chain, of prophets that preceded him and prepared the world for him; nor must we refuse honor to those who, coming after him, have carried on the blessed work of human regeneration for which he lived and died. Let sectarianism perish, then. Let denominational and geographical boundaries be forever forgotten, and let all nations unite in celebrating a universal festival in honor of all prophets, regarding them as the Elder Brothers of the human race. Hindu brethren, as ye honor your prophets, honor ye likewise the illustrious reformers and great men of Christendom. I know, my educated countrymen, you appreciate and honor England's immortal bard, Shakespeare, the greatest literary genius of the West; and you honor, too, the military and political and scientific great men, whose brilliant deeds shed lustre on the profane history of Christian nations. Why should you scruple, then, to pay the tribute of your esteem and gratitude to the religious geniuses, the inspired prophets of Christendom, who have nourished and enriched its soul, and in fact the soul of humanity at large? To you, my Christian brethren, also I humbly say,—as ye honor your prophets, honor ye likewise the prophets of the East. Thus hostile churches and the dismembered races of mankind shall be knit together in one family, in the bonds of universal faith in the common Father, and universal gratitude and esteem towards their elder brothers, the Prophets.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Discomfort, Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

[Sermon delivered July 11, 1869, by Rev. W. W. Williams, and published in the Toledo Blade of July 23.]

Exodus xii: 49.—One law shall be to the home-born, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.

It was foreseen that, favored as Israel was to become, people of other nations would desire to become Israelites by adoption. In the code of laws which God gave His people, He made provision for this, and for questions which were likely to be raised from this condition of things. With regard to the observance of the anniversary of the nation's deliverance from a foreign yoke, it was easy to see that these adopted citizens would desire to celebrate that event. And the probability that they would seek to incorporate some of the customs and peculiarities of their own nations into this observance, was also foreseen. This point was squarely met, by the enactment with regard to the manner of keeping this anniversary. "One law shall be to him that is home-born, and to the stranger that sojourneth among you;" the fair construction of which is, that the Israelite by adoption must observe the rules practised by the home-born Israelite, in the observance of this anniversary. Nothing could be more reasonable to require of this class of citizens. Nothing more just or proper for them to observe.

At the establishment of our government it was foreseen that a desire to enjoy its advantages would draw to us many strangers from other lands. Its founders made provision for admitting them to full citizenship. There seems to have been no suspicion that they would ever seek to mould our institutions to those of the countries they would abandon. It was taken for granted that they would accept our institutions as they found them; their very coming to us constituting the strongest possible declaration of preference for our customs and laws. But experience has developed a strong tendency on the part of our adopted citizens to introduce among us customs to which we believe are to be ascribed, in a great measure, the very evils rather than endure which they have left their native lands; and there has been no little aptitude developed among the home-born to adopt these customs, until it looks as if the wine-bibbing and beer-drinking and Sabbath desecration of Europe might here attain a degree of license which it has there never reached.

The day upon which we became an independent people, has been from the first observed as a national anniversary, celebrated with the firing of cannon, music, orations and other rejoicings, so that it has become a national institution. There is no statute regulating its observance; but the achievers of our liberty instituted and handed down to us certain practices in its observance, to which custom and the practice of nearly a century have given the character of laws, the penalty of violating which should be the reprobation of all men who have any reverence for the past. Any respect for the principles and memory of the men who gave liberty to our nation, and by their practice taught us how to commemorate its establishment. One of the laws which their example and the practice of near a hundred years have laid down for the keeping of this anniversary is, "That the Sabbath shall not be desecrated, or its religious observance interfered with, by public celebrations." This rule has governed the home-born American for over ninety years. The usual quiet of Sunday has hardly been disturbed when the fourth of July has occurred upon that day. Now and then an individual may have failed to restrain his ardor. But public demonstrations have respected the sanctity of the Sabbath. The Sabbath, observed somewhat in accordance with the Divine commandment, was an institution which those who fled from the oppression and poverty to which they were victims in fatherland, found thoroughly established among us. Not merely by common consent, but the statute recognizes and defends it. To sport or game or engage in common labor, or shoot upon the first day of the week, is made a crime by law, punishable with fine and imprisonment. These laws, both of custom and of the statute book, placed some restraint upon some of our foreign-born citizens, to which they had not been accustomed and under which they have become restive. They hankered after the indulgences of the Egypt from whence they had come out. Especially are they distasteful to some who do not love the Bible, because they show deference to its teachings. Hence have these customs been disregarded and the law trampled upon and defied. It has been the aim, as much as possible—successful in some cases—to secure executive and judicial officers who will not enforce the laws, that they may be violated with impunity.

Such disregard for the laws of the State and unscrupulousness concerning the commandments of God, if it does not proceed from, must beget obtuseness to the feelings of other men, and a self-willness, upon which consideration for the sensibilities or even the rights of neighbors have little influence. With such persons the fact that open saloons and unlimited drinking, noisy songs and blasts of horns, upon a day held sacred to rest and worship, shock the religious sensibilities and pain the hearts of a large portion of their neighborhood, is of no consequence. So much has their disposition to introduce these un-American customs of Sabbath desecration strengthened, that our last Fourth of July, occurring upon the first day of the week, witnessed a departure from the American custom, public and extensive, and saw the practice inaugurated of celebrating it upon Sunday, with public procession, shooting and other demonstrations, as if it had occurred upon any other day. From the fact that this breach of the American rule was simultaneous in a number of places, it assumes the appearance of a concerted effort to force an abrogation of the time-honored custom of our ancestors, and of ourselves.

In our own city this wrong to the feelings and usages of the home-born—this open violation of the statute of our State—presents a feature which gives every law-abiding citizen, whatever his views of the observance of the Sabbath, cause for alarm. The officer to whom is committed the duty of executing the law as it exists—not as he would prefer it should be—to whom is given the whole police force of the city for the express purpose of guarding against the commission of crime, it is said, assumed a conspicuous place in this open celebration, one of the advertised features of which was a direct and repeated violation of the law, which says that "if any person of the age of fourteen years or upward shall be found on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shooting, he or she shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $20, or be confined in the county jail for a term not exceeding twenty days, or both, at the discretion of the Court." To suppose that the Mayor of a city of the first class was not well aware of the terms and provisions of this enactment, would be to suppose him unqualified for the position. Knowing the terms of this law, and not only standing by while gun after gun was fired upon Sunday, but taking part in a celebration of which this was a published feature, entering no protest against it, using no authority to prevent it, what reason have citizens to believe or expect that other laws will be less wantonly outraged by the consent of this officer? What reason is there for law-breakers to fear the execution of the laws against them by such an executive? How they regarded it, had quick and forcible illustration. A certain place or places in our city had been ordered by the Police Commissioners to be closed upon Sunday. This order had been carried into effect up to the day of the celebration. But, (if I am correctly informed, and I have every reason to credit my information,) upon learning that the Mayor of the city had given his sanction to the open violation of the law for this day, the proprietor of one of these establishments gave out that his place would be open and the usual entertainment given upon Sunday, the Fourth day of July. The police gave him notice that he must not carry out his intention. He claimed high example, and said that he should follow that example, for after the open sanction by the Mayor of the proceedings at the garden, embracing direct violation of express statute, he would not presume to interfere. The matter was referred to the Mayor, and he did not presume to interfere. Nor do I see how he can complain, if these performances are continued from Sunday to Sunday. Has an officer any more right to set aside a law for one day than he has for another? The law makes no exception in favor of the Fourth of July. And if a Mayor may set aside one law upon this day, why not another? If shooters may have unlimited license for one day against the law, why may not house-breakers?

I speak of our Mayor only as an officer. As a man and a citizen, public-spirited, large-hearted, enterprising, and energetic, no man esteems him more than do I; and far be it from me to detract in the least from his personal character. But as the first officer of a city of the first class, he has in this case publicly proclaimed his own incompetency. To say nothing of the impropriety which there was in the highest officer of the city so publicly outraging the feelings of a great number of persons, to whom he was indebted for his position—persons who are excelled by no others in character—the very persons to whom he would turn for support, if his authority were resisted by the lawless—persons whom neither he nor his predecessors have had to restrain from violating the laws—to say nothing of the criminality of weakening one's authority and influence as our first officer by losing the confidence of so large a number of the most intelligent and orderly of our citizens—for a Mayor so to tie his own hands—for him so to place himself in the power of those whom the authorities have found it necessary to restrain, that when the police attempted to prevent these worst corruptors of our youth from committing their wickedness, they could plead such illustrious example, and that efficiently—proves a failure to appreciate the responsibilities of the position which demonstrates a sad lack of the high qualities which fit a man to be Mayor of such a city as ours. But if there were no law in the matter, so unnecessarily to trample upon the holiest feelings of so large a portion of citizens, second to none in character, itself displays a great want of appreciation of what is becoming to the officer. Had he been a private citizen, many would feel the injustice of such an outrage to the feelings of neighbors. But as a public officer one is bound most sacredly to regard these feelings.

Had our Mayor discouraged this movement, it would have been a graceful and no more than a fit acknowledgement of his regard for those who, knowing his sentiments upon this subject of Sabbath-keeping, waived their fears in this matter to the extent of giving him their votes, and thus expressed their confidence that the Mayor would lay aside his individual preferences, and enforce the laws as they stand. An officer with that quickness of perception which is so essential a requisite to the proper fulfilment of the duties of so exalted a position, would have perceived this, and would not have failed to seize this opportunity to show those who have the American view of the Sabbath, that they need not fear to elect those who hold different views to offices which involve the enforcement of the laws as they are. Instead of this, we now see that we cannot trust the execution of our laws to officers who will not, as private citizens, regard them. And I speak on this subject to-day simply to bring before the men of this congregation this demonstration, that you cannot trust such men with the execution of your laws. Neither their feeling of obligation to the duties of the office, nor their regard for your feelings, will be sufficient to counterbalance their desire to gratify their own pride of opinion. The only safe way is for every man who believes either in the sanctity of the divine or human law of the Sabbath, to vote against men of this stamp, and for men who they are quite sure will not permit their personal opinions to set aside the laws they are pledged to execute.

In this matter of our Sabbath, it seems to me that the American feeling and the American rule should be respected by those who come to us from abroad. They confess the superiority of the advantages which they enjoy in coming to our shores—the great gain it is to them to take advantage of our invitation to come here. Men do not expatriate themselves by millions unless they expect to be greatly the gainers. We are gainers, also; no doubt, great gainers. But we shall not be, if our institutions are to be subverted. And the terms of our invitation to them are virtually that they conform to our laws and usages. We have not said, it is true, in our organic law, "You shall not change any of our institutions." But we have left it within the power of foreign-born citizens, if they become sufficiently numerous, to change every institution. They may, when they become largely enough possessed of political power, bring over their princes and kings and emperors, and install them here, as well as their Sabbath. They have the political right to do the one as well as the other. The Roman Catholics have the same right, if they attain sufficient numbers, to establish their church as a State religion; but none would sooner cry out against this, as an infringement of the terms upon which foreigners are invited to become citizens, than would those who claim the right to change completely the character of one of the institutions they find established here by custom, and defended by law: and which the home-born here, for nearly a century, regarded as essential to the harmony and stability of our system.

Nor would it be unduly modest for men who at home have only made failures in their attempts to establish liberal institutions, to acknowledge that the founders of the American system, who did succeed in establishing civil freedom, understood quite as well the true boundary between safe liberty and undue and dangerous license, quite as well the bearing of a well-kept Sabbath upon the prosperity of a nation—as do they. It is not quite modest, nor altogether becoming, for men whose success in this direction, in their own countries, was never eminent, to come here and say, in effect, "Your fathers did not know what institutions are best adapted to a free people. They did not even know the proper time and manner for celebrating the great anniversary of the independence they achieved. Let our great scholars and theologians inform their ignorance and rebuke their bigotry; let us teach their children when and how to celebrate the Fourth of July, so as really to commemorate the birth of civil liberty." This is not quite modest. In some circles it would not be considered as quite well-bred. It is not quite kind to the memories of those old Sabbath-keepers, who threw off the yoke of a king and made themselves sovereigns, and invited men from other lands who could not do as much for themselves to come and share their sovereignty, and be welcome to all its rights and privileges. Some would esteem it an insult to be told that to observe the anniversary of our independence as the men who achieved that independence for the nation observed it, and taught their children to observe it, is to estimate liberty and independence and the memory of those who achieved it for the nation, not above "sectarian" ends. Under what institutions were these men reared? "Upon what milk" have they been nurtured, that, having never struck a blow to obtain it, they presume to know how to estimate liberty and independence better than did men who bled and suffered to achieve it for the nation?

Christian men, this question of a Sabbath quietly and decorously kept, so that they who wish to worship God can do so without having their devotions disturbed, can go and come to and from their places of worship without being jostled and terrified by drunken men, or of having it, the day of all the week, most given to drunkenness and riot, to dissipation and waste, will sooner or later be forced squarely upon you. It is for you to say whether you will meet it now, before the public sentiment is still more demoralized, or will wait until familiarity with its desecrations has still further prepared those who still have some respect for it to consent to its entire abrogation. It cannot be denied—for the facts are too palpable—that, under the present system of open saloons and beer gardens, there is more drunkenness and violence and crime upon this day than upon any other. The arrests made upon this day show it, though not nearly all the cases demanding arrest probably come under the notice of the officers of the law. Nor can it be questioned, that the cause of this excess is these open drinking-places. The experiment has been tried once or twice for a few Sundays within the memory of some of us, of closing these places, and the improved condition of our streets in these respects was at once manifest. Nor would the advocates of the present condition of things dare submit the matter to this fair practical test.

We shall never accomplish any reform in this respect by folding our hands and saying, "Nothing can be done." We must use our power and enter upon this matter with a determination to persevere until we succeed. We have law enough for our purpose, if we but had officers who would enforce the law. But we must make up our minds to meet with many difficulties, and, possibly, with many a defeat. Success will, however, attend persevering effort; for truth and virtue and God are on our side; and if God be for us, who can be against us? There are men in this house who, when they were in a minority so hopeless as not to be even recognized, stood up with the determination to abolish a great wrong that was firmly entrenched and supported by law. They have lived to see their purpose secured, and a large majority of the people in agreement with them. Like resoluteness and perseverance in this matter will secure a similar result.

A little girl in a Western town, after studying for some time a picture of the Magdalen reclining on her face and weeping, suddenly turned to her mother and exclaimed: "Mamma, I know why Mrs. Magdalen is crying. It is because Mr. Magdalen does not buy her clothes enough."

A clergyman in Pennsylvania, who couldn't see the joke, has refused to buy Mark Twain's book, and is in fact disgusted with it. "Why," said he to the agent, "the man who could weep at the tomb of Adam must be an idiot."

Miscellaneous.

BEECHER ON SUNDAY.

[From the N. Y. Tribune.]

"I am not superstitious on this subject. I don't think that if a man, walking in his garden on the Sabbath, should see a weed and pull it up, it would be marked down against him in the Lord's book. I regard it as the one day in the week when a man can say, I am not a clerk, not an apprentice; I am not to crouch to any one; to-day I am a man. A man stands on his manhood that day. Wherefore, I say that Sunday should not be a working day, because it must be unlike other days. Sunday is the poor man's, it is your day, it is my day, it is liberty day. It is not a visiting day. I am not superstitious about this either, I believe that the question is not, can I, or can I not visit? but rather, what sort of visiting would do me good, make me better? I have known ministers, going to preach on the Sabbath, after the services not to be asked even to go to dinner, from an over-scrupulousness on the part of their parishioners, who were afraid of breaking the Holy Day. I do not think it is wrong, either, to write letters home on the Sabbath day. Every child should be so brought up that, when he thinks of home, he shall think Sunday the best day, as the culminating point of the joys of the week. It is in the light of making this a day of joy that we can discuss the question of walking and amusement on the Sabbath. Now I am decidedly in favor of walking upon the Sabbath. And if any go, all should go; don't let the children encounter temptation alone. But it must be done soberly.

So far as the working classes are concerned, it may be an occasional truth that it is wise to take them out of their dirty, filthy homes, and give them an excursion down the bay or up the river. Singing birds and beautiful flowers are very pleasant; but stop—give them first moral culture and the means of interpreting these beauties, so that they can see God's handiwork in every flower. I set my face like flint against making Sunday a day of pleasure for the rich man and a day of bondage for the poor man. I wouldn't sign a petition against running the cars on Sunday. If there is any sin in it, I think it is just as bad to ride in a carriage to church as a horse-car. In arguing for a sacred Sabbath, I am arguing for the poor man. It is his day. It is his bulwark against oppression. Many have supposed that Christ set his face against the Sabbath. He did not. He explicitly declares that Sunday was made for man, not man for Sunday. Sunday is made to serve man. It is made to make man freer, nobler. I remark, secondly, that a negative Sabbath is as poor a way of keeping it as well can be. The prevalent idea of the Sabbath is that you must not do something. I remember in my childhood, at our home in Litchfield, how often upon the Sabbath I would see something to laugh at, and I would laugh. 'Henry,' my mother would say (as good a woman as ever lived,) 'Henry, you mustn't laugh.' 'Why not?' 'Because it is Sunday.' And I would stand at the western window, with my brother Charles, and watching the slowly declining sun, would nudge him and say, 'Charlie, Sunday is most gone.' And my mother would remark, 'Henry, you ought not to wish that Sunday would be through.' But I was glad when it was through; it hadn't made me in love with it. It was a restrictive day to me, a perpetual pruning day. Oh! that catechism that I couldn't learn, didn't learn, and can't say even now! Have you brought up your children so that they like the Sabbath? If you haven't so used the Sabbath day, then you have broken it. When you come to church, don't look in as if you were going into a sculchre. Don't pause solemnly, and go up the aisle with a disconsolate visage. Ah! if our Lord was a crowned despot, this would be right; he is a God of love, of mercy, forgiveness. Men ought to be striving to make this day a more cheerful, a more pleasant day than all the rest of the week. Brothers, friends, fellow-citizens, there is nothing I care so much about, as the sacredness of the Sabbath. But I don't think you can make it so by law; it must be supported by public opinion. Here is a day hallowed by four thousand years of observance. Let us keep it so that it may be a delight to the Lord. Be assured that not long after Sunday has been abolished will it be kept except by the sword and bayonet of the despot."

A BIGOTED SUNDAY LAW.

WORKING ON THE LORD'S DAY.—In the Superior Criminal Court at Worcester, last week, James E. Donovan, of that city, was found guilty of doing work on the Lord's Day, and fined $10 and costs. The evidence showed that on Sunday, Jan. 16, 1870, Donovan was at work on his house, hammering, and that a complaint was made by the neighbors to the police. Defendant took the stand in his own behalf, and he testified that he was in the employ of the Bay State Shoe and Leather Company; that he had worked generally on the Lord's Day since he was in Worcester, either for himself or the company aforesaid; that he owned the house in which he was at work, and was fitting it up for tenants; that he did the work himself on Sunday to save expense of employing somebody else to do it. His counsel claimed that the example of Christ was in favor of a liberal use of the Sabbath, and that the work defendant did was necessary. Judge Dewey instructed the jury that the question for them to decide was whether the work done by defendant was one of necessity.—Boston Herald.

Rather a hard case when a man cannot be allowed to do useful work in his own house on a Sunday! If he had been loafing about the streets, smoking a pipe or a cigar, or drinking whiskey in a grog-shop, he would not have been prosecuted; but because he fitted up his house for tenants, he was "found guilty of doing work on the Lord's Day, and fined $10 and costs!" It is about time, one would think, in this enlightened State, that such nonsense was stopped; but we suppose it never will be, so long as the foolish law which upholds it is allowed a place on the statute book. Sunday, properly observed, is an excellent social institution; but if a man is to be fined for doing useful work on that day, then the day is rather an injury than a benefit.

Then, again, to show the still more manifest injustice of the above decision, the law seems to allow pleasure on Sunday, but forbids any work, even though performed in one's own house. Thus the cars, (both steam and horse,) run on Sunday; so do steam-boats and other vessels; and cigar-shops and grog-shops are open and tolerably well patronized. But because a man did some useful work in his house on a Sunday, he had to be fined $10 and costs! This is law in Massachusetts to-day, and it is law because it was enacted by the influence of religious bigotry, which is the parent of all evil, and which, if it had the power, would make of Sunday merely a season of penance and an auxiliary for the promotion of priest-craft and imposture.—Boston Investigator.

ECHOES FROM ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

A busy week, and one filled with good business, has just passed. It brought to workers a precious comparison of labor and experience, and, however wide the theoretical divisions which its meetings may have made evident, its results establish only the more firmly the practical maxim, that the world is to be redeemed by faith in principles, and by works of interested love.

Where opinions are mistaken for principles, and where high zeal is mistaken for love of the human and divine, controversy becomes bitter, and differences are not easily harmonized. Without the fundamental unity of God, the manifoldness of humanity would have destroyed itself piecemeal before this time. And without the underlying oneness of religion, sects would, ere this, have eaten each other up, and we should have no church. But this whole, which is greater than its parts, so keeps its divine grandeur and harmony within the sight of human generations that the largest and most powerful centres of command and exclusion are utterly unable to annihilate the factions and fragments of dissent which gather up views and convictions forgotten or ignored by dominant parties, and likely on this very account to be found of a deeper and more subtle value than the formulated creed of society.

The progress of critical thought, however, puts more and more of this subtle value into the working machinery of every denomination. The liberalization of the sects, the great and happy feature of modern religious thought, is the result of this progress. We in the present day will set no bounds to it, but while we cannot attempt to limit results, we may very legitimately point out the errors of methods, and compare what is fair and true and fine, in religious ratiocination with what is shallow, false and artificial.

The record of the Free Religious Society, as shown in its anniversary meetings, made evident some of these contradictions between proper scope and actual methods which society should not uncharitably denounce, but which it cannot pass by without comment. Mr. Abbot, on the whole, its most typical man, is a born polemist, and one who turns against the church that spirit and those weapons of persecution which the church itself, in its less instructed periods, has not been ashamed to employ against the sheep without the fold, who should have been lovingly sought, but not hunted like wolves. The world thinks that the time for this warfare has passed, and that for religions as for societies a peaceable exchange of values is better and more benefiting than an acrimonious striving for supremacy. The delenda est Christianitas, in which Mr. Abbot's demonstrations usually result, does not savor of the former process. The instinct of the one man power is never perhaps more forcibly illustrated than when a single individual insists upon forcing his own views, narrow, partial, and exceedingly subjective, upon the consciousness of the whole world. Such acts of violence are far removed from the breadth and catholicity of true and liberal reform. Does Mr. Abbot forget that dialectics, although universal in their use, are still limited in the individual's use of them? His critical action cannot bring him outside of himself. Only that fineness and subtlety of appreciation which allows one man to see with the eyes, to feel with the hearts of many men—only this enlarges the sphere of a man's judgment. But he who, taking his one view, negatives the sight of all other eyes, performs the tyrant's office, and dwarfs, instead of enlarging, the horizon of human thought.

That the Free Religious Society has given us no hints for the future we will not say, yet the views we were able to gather from their meeting were suggested rather by what they did not, than by what they did formulate and approve. They did show us that this effete system and superstition which in the present world so largely takes the place of true Christianity is an encumbrance to be undermined and removed, as strenuously as possible. They did show us that Christolatry, the worship of the person of Christ, and Bibliolatry, the superstition of the Bible, are at the present day inimical to the pursuit of Christ's doctrine, and to the true valuation of the wonderful book which has so largely carried the poetic and prophetic spirit of the Orient into the literal, prosaic Occident. The earnest study of the spiritual truth which Christ carried beyond Plato, and which every master soul aids to develop and to differentiate—the adoption of the plane of absolute human value, of unitary interest and obligation—these seem to us the great remedies for the world's twofold offence of heartlessness and superstition. The discussions at the Free Religious meeting made us think so more than ever, but scarcely suggested these as the prominent objects which the Association proposes to itself.

Mrs. Cheney's well written discourse was sound in the ground occupied and in the objects stated by it, but when she, too, endeavored to institute an antithetical comparison between Christianity and Free Religion, to the benefit of the latter, she reminded us of the nautical device of drawing around a man a circle he cannot jump over by tracing a chalk circle around his own body. Mrs. Cheney named no one trait as dear and precious to Free Religion, which is not dear and sacred to Liberal Christianity. The opposition which she postulated as existing between Christianity and Natural Science has no place among the representative phenomena of the present day, in which the two domains are amply measured out, and left to the guardianship of their separate methods. We do not know that any leading man of science, of our time, demands the restriction or removal of the Christian faith as a condition of the further prosecution of any study or theory. Modern study has emancipated science from ecclesiastical domination, which yet was essential to its life in rude ages when the love of learning was confined to the clergy. It has brought to light no antithesis between anything that is genuine in any religion, and the great principles of science. Nor does Christianity refuse to be studied in the historic ranks in which she is not the absolute and only religion, but only one of several—the nearest indeed to the absolute, and the only one that fully unites the energy of the service of humanity with the peace and liberty of the inner illumination.

One word further we may say as to the thoughts suggested by the discussion concerning the use of the Bible in our public schools. Believing as we do, that the superstition of a thing impedes the use of it, we should be very willing to concede that a certain portion of a certain book should not forcibly be read and listened to at certain hours, as if any valuable result could be secured by the more formal recognition of its presence and authority. But we should consider the omission of Bible studies in the education of children as a very grave one. The literary, historical and ethical values of the volume are such as the human race can ill spare. Christianity needs to refresh itself constantly from its deep and simple source. Judaism, its venerable mother, bears a crown of poesy and prophecy unrivalled by other vedas and classics. The Saxon race has fed largely and with profit upon these mental aliments. It must not be forgotten that the reading of the Bible in Protestantism stands for the right of private judgment, and thus coheres with the suffrage itself, and with all that is liberal and progressive. It is forbidden in despotic countries because its truths are the heresies of despotism. It ill becomes a Free Association to make war upon a book which carries with it so much of the atmosphere and spontaneity of freedom. Finally, the blind worship of the work is as pernicious as any other form of idolatry. The ignorant perversion of it is a barrier to thought and a stumbling block to progress. But the intelligent study of it brings a profit which no extension of literary resources does ought to lessen, nay, to which recent Oriental studies and critical researches have largely added.

It is only fair to the Free Religious Association to add that we were able to attend a part only of its exercises, and that the impressions recorded above were derived from the addresses of Mr. Abbot, Mrs. Cheney, and the afternoon discussion concerning the reading of the Bible in our public schools.

VICARIOUS VICTORY.

[From the Christian Radical, Pittsburgh, Pa.]

When a man has a "job" of work on hand that is too much for his brain and muscle, it is pleasant to have another do it for him. If, for instance, a man has a weight to handle that is too heavy for him, or a question to answer that involves more intricacies than he has thought to penetrate, or a bold, broad, strong man sets up some granite argument against his creed which he cannot move nor threaten into terms, how he is relieved if a stronger man than he presses in to the rescue and puts his grip of hand or brain to the difficulty! Ah, but it is good!

Well, just such a case we have now in the Liberal Christian. Our readers know how Mr. Abbot of THE INDEX has gone out from the fold and pasturage of Unitarianism. That he should do so is only to be logical. That a man who begins with Unitarianism should not only tire of it, but especially should come into utter contempt of Christianity, is a necessity of premises. For it begins to be, as we have before said in the Radical, in the loss of that Christ that is perfect sufficiency of spiritual want and eternal Bond of souls. Mr. Abbot is only the first ripening of that great apostacy from the Lord Jesus Christ that Unitarianism, with its apologies and flatteries, and ethical platitudes, and moral negations, threatens, and of which she is mother.

But, to return, the Liberal Christian, not pleased with the "superfluity" of Mr. Abbot's "naughtiness" has, in utter blindness of the necessities of logic, again and again undertaken to tackle him in little spurts of bad feeling, and in short grips of religious wrestling, only in every instance (we are sorry to say) to meet with humiliating discomfiture. It soon found THE INDEX more than it could manage, and its editor a lithe quick man of tremendous nerve who could not be bound nor put on his back. In every tug it fell, defeated, underneath.

Now at this point D. A. Wasson comes to the rescue. In the Boston Radical of May, this clear-headed and powerful thinker grapples Abbot in vital places. We do not say he undoes Abbot, but he does smite him under his very ribs. It is true his argument is no defence of Christianity, of which the Liberal Christian says so much. It is simply Theistic. But it makes the Liberal Christian very happy. It twitters and sings in emotional snatches. It publishes Mr. Wasson's discussion in instalments. Father Belows declares with an abounding and joyous rhetoric that "if there be any man who has tackled the subject of Mr. Abbot's opinions and mauled them with a sledge hammer to be felt to the end of the question, it is the drubbing that gentleman's views have received in the last Radical at the hands of Mr. Wasson." Oh, yes! Mr. Wasson has taken a job off its hands, it had not the brain and brawn to do. It was unable to shield itself from the pitiless strokes the Toledo "infidel" flung back in its face. We hope it will never forget its benefactor. We thank Mr. Wasson, on behalf of the Liberal Christian, for the light he has broken on its dreary hearthstone, and for the exuberance of joy it has vouchsafed it.

REPORT OF THE WESTERN SECRETARY OF THE A. U. A.

[From the Christian Register.]

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA, May 2, 1750.

To the Executive Committee of the American Unitarian Association:—

GENTLEMEN:—I herewith present a report of a missionary journey among the Western churches of our body. As the journey is yet only half finished, I shall confine myself to details, and omit any record of general impressions. I left Ann Arbor at noon on the 31st day of March, and, travelling through the night, reached—

1. RICHMOND, IND., at 10 A. M., on April 1st. In this city I spent some six hours, calling upon prominent men of liberal religious opinions, and advising with them concerning the formation of a liberal church. There are men and women enough who would attend the meetings of such a church, but the difficulties in the way of harmonious organization and union are serious. The Spiritualists have control of the hall in which such meetings must be held, and have no wish to hear liberal preachers of any other connection, so long as they can get their own "speakers." The "Progressive Friends" have strong prejudices against any "hiring" or settled ministry. And the liberalism of Richmond is mostly of a very radical type, rather that of Mr. Abbot and his INDEX than of average Unitarianism. Some that I saw, however, are confident that before many months these difficulties will be overcome, and that a strong society of the liberal faith will be gathered in this important and growing city, the third or fourth in the State. They will be ready to welcome a preacher and to try the experiment, as soon as a suitable place can be procured.

On Monday morning, May 9th, I passed a few hours with Rev. Dr. Eliot and Rev. Mr. Learned, and found them very hopeful about our cause in St. Louis. At noon I went north to Jacksonville, Ill., and spent the afternoon and evening with our brethren there. Rev. Lyman Clarke has labored faithfully for several months, and is, on the whole, satisfied that the society is firmly established. The leading men in the liberal society are strong men in every sense, cultivated, thoughtful, sagacious, and quite able to sustain their movement without a minister. They have on Sunday mornings a conference, which is very successful and well-sustained; on Sunday afternoon a good school for the children; and on Sunday evenings Mr. Clark preaches to them. I attended, in the evening, a meeting of a literary club of gentlemen, at which the subject for discussion was the "fifty affirmations" of Mr. F. E. Abbot. From the discussion in that meeting it was evident that the liberal thought in Jacksonville had competent defenders, but also very earnest adversaries.

Sir George Staunton visited a man in India who had committed a murder; and in order not only to save his life, but, what was of much more consequence, his caste, he submitted to the penalty imposed—this was, to sleep seven years on a bedstead, without any mattress, the whole surface of which was studded with points of iron, resembling nails, but not so sharp as to penetrate the flesh. Sir George saw him in the fifth year of his probation, and his skin was then like the hide of a rhinoceros, but more callous; at that time however, he could sleep comfortably on his "bed of thorns," and remarked that at the expiration of the term of his sentence he should most probably continue the system from choice, which he had been obliged to adopt.

A Boston writer comes to the defence of women against the current notion that they are peculiarly addicted to gossip, alleging that in a country grocery store, among barrels of molasses and piles of salt fish, more gossip is talked by men in one evening, than is heard in all the farm-houses in town.

A lady friend hands us the above and thinks it true—we agree with her.—Seaside Oracle.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I have often intended to write you to say how much pleasure and profit I derive from the weekly visit of THE INDEX. I am more and more convinced that it is doing a special kind of work that cannot be done by a magazine like the Radical. The mass of our people are too busy and have too little mental training to sit down and work through long articles. Great leading principles given them in short hand and furnishing themes for meditation and conversation at odd hours are all that the majority have time or spirit for. These I think you give in admirable form. The paper is eminently stimulating. It goes right at the pith of the matter and sets people thinking.

I wish at times there were more in the paper of what is often termed the mystical element. Not anything 'misty,' however, but more of that interior, palpable sense of actual contact with a living God, of feeling, touching, hitting right against him, which the Tauler type of men are so full of. It is through experience of this sort that religion as the life of God in the soul of man becomes solid reality to us, an experience born of a consensus of all the capacities of our nature working in unity. We are all such partial bits of human nature that we tend continually to run on the line of single faculties, and not with all abreast at once.

I have not read Wasson's review of 'Mr. Abbot's Religion,' though I intend to. But as I glanced at it, I fell on his illustration of the legless man. Are not you in your boundless charity, or rather longing to be at one with all your fellow-creatures, a little inclined to sacrifice the general law to the apparent individual exception,—to give undue prominence to the latter to the extent of false emphasis? Of course it is a great thing for the legless man to have his champion. He too is a brother. But he is not entitled to play the fox who had had his tail cut off in the trap. And you are too rounded and complete a man, to spend more than a limited amount of time on him to the neglect of those who retain tail enough to come full circle."

—"I heartily approve your object and I have no doubt you will show to your readers in the words of one of your correspondents 'how warm and vitalizing, how rich and uplifting is truth, what large life and blessing shall flow from it, as well as how cramping, chilling and killing are the poor idolatries of book and person which prevail all around us.'

With sincere hopes that many of the more intellectual and conscientious of the ministers of historical religion may soon adopt the truthful and honorable position you have placed yourself in, I remain, &c."

—"I am perfectly satisfied with the tone of THE INDEX; and hereafter count me a regular subscriber—one of the pay-in-advance number too—as long as THE INDEX continues to point, as I certainly feel that it does now, in the right direction. In the name of truth, do not yield a single inch of the ground you now occupy. The constant yearning of thousands you fully satisfy."

—"Need I say I have been very much pleased with your paper and your views? I honor your courage and manliness in nailing your flag to the mast and sticking to it. Though I cannot accept your views, I must say I am more in sympathy with them than I was. You are the clearest of all the writers I read in the Radical school."

—"I have taken many reformatory papers which were good, but that word doesn't more than half express the excellent quality of your paper."

ODE TO JUSTICE.

Goddess severe and stern,
Whose throne will ever stand, has ever stood,—
From whose dread fiat men the truth shall learn,
That God is great and good!

Thy sacred law shall bind
The fleeting race of men, yet leave them free;
Thou bear'st the stamp of the Eternal Mind, Immutability.

None can escape thine eye,
Nor shun thy vengeance, who forsakes the right;
Thou listenest ever to the feeble cry,
And thou shalt conquer Might.

When the whole earth is red,
And nations writhe beneath the tyrant's power,
Thine eye beholds each tear of anguish shed;
Guilt hath its reckoning hour.

By thy relentless law
The despot feels his boasted strength decay,
His rod of iron turn to brittle straw,
His tottering throne give way.

Man may thy power distrust,
Yet on thy will the circling ages wait;
Thy hand shall raise sad Virtue from the dust;
Thou rul'st all-ruling Fate.

Thou Other Name of Love!
Endless thy reign, and vast as space thy throne;
Thou rul'st the eternal courts of Heaven above,
For God and thou are one!

The Index.

JULY 2, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

The near approach of the Fourth of July will revive in many minds the debate on the Sunday question which last year grew out of this time-honored festival. The sermon we print this morning was delivered by Rev. W. W. Williams, minister of the Congregational Society in Toledo, in rebuke of the celebration of the day on Sunday by the Germans, and especially of the participation in it by Hon. William Kraus, the universally and highly esteemed Mayor of the city. As we intend next week to reprint the evening lecture we delivered in reply to Mr. Williams, we judge it no more than fair previously to publish his sermon in full, in order that our readers may be able to correct any error or misrepresentation into which we may have unintentionally fallen.

We call especial attention to the advertisement of The Radical in this number of THE INDEX. A chance is now offered to secure the first volume of that very able magazine, which has been long out of print. A complete set of the volumes will be before long as difficult as desirable to obtain. The publication of The Radical is suspended for six months.

The July number of the "Young Enterprise," which is edited by Masters Reed, Waggar & Co., of this city, for twenty-five cents a year, comes out in quarto-form, with an illustrated title-page and spicy contents. It is a credit to "young Toledo."

ANXIOUS FOR INFORMATION.

A few weeks ago, the following paragraph appeared in the Cleveland American Spiritualist :—

What is "Free Religion?" We see it advertised, we hear it talked of, and read about it in THE INDEX and other periodicals, but we have yet to learn what this remarkable article consists of. What are its elements, its ingredients? in a word, What is it? Is it something or nothing? Will our capable friend and editor of the Toledo INDEX enlighten us?

We laid this paragraph by, for the purpose of answering it when we could do so conveniently. In the last number, however, of the same paper, our impatient neighbor repeats his inquiry thus :—

FREE RELIGION!

Again we respectfully ask the editor of the Toledo INDEX what "Free Religion" is? Does Mr. Abbot mean, or will he say, that "fifty" or five hundred, "affirmations" constitute "free religion?" If not, what is it? Of what is the article composed? "Affirmations" are cheap, and of little consequence, no matter who makes them. Any one seemingly as familiar with "free religion" as the editor of THE INDEX, ought to be able to give the world a slight index of what it is.

We confess to feeling a little puzzled how to satisfy this somewhat curious demand. Suppose we were to ask the editor of the American Spiritualist—"What is Spiritualism?" He would doubtless make some reply in words, in sentences of some sort, affirming the essential points of Spiritualism. For instance (we do not, of course, assume to speak for him), he might say,—"Spiritualism is faith in the immediate communication of living human beings with departed spirits." But this is only an "affirmation," and "affirmations are cheap." How, then, is our friend going to inform us what Spiritualism is? Will he not be driven to "affirmations," after all? And how can we inform him what (in our opinion) Free Religion is, except through our "affirmations?" His demand is ludicrously unreasonable, as he will see by thus turning the tables.

What we mean by Free Religion, we have explained again and again in THE INDEX. For seven weeks we printed our "Fifty Affirmations" on our first page; in our third number we devoted a whole essay to this very question,—"What is Free Religion?" and in essays and editorials ever since we have set forth our views on the subject, in perfectly plain and unambiguous language. If, after all this, the American Spiritualist cannot understand what Free Religion is, as we use the words, it is no fault of ours. A poor, badgered school-master said to an angry parent, complaining that his boy learned nothing at school,—"I don't undertake to furnish books and brains, too." We do not imagine any such reason as is here hinted for the difficulty of our bright and usually penetrating neighbor in seeing what we mean. But we suspect the cause of his poor eye-sight, in this case is precisely that of Sam Weller's, in the famous case of "Bardell against Pickwick:"—

"What's your name, sir?" inquired the judge.

"Sam Weller, my lord," replied that gentleman.

"Do you spell it with a 'V' or a 'W'?" inquired the judge.

"That depends upon the taste and fancy of the speller, my lord," replied Sam. "I never had occasion to spell it more than once or twice in my life; but I spell it with a 'V.'"

Here a voice in the gallery exclaimed aloud: "Quite right too, Samivel.—quite right. Put it down a ve, my lord, put it down a ve."

"Who is that, who dares to address the court?" said the little judge, looking up. "Usher!"

"Yes, my lord."

"Bring that person here instantly."

"Yes, my lord."

But as the usher didn't find the person, he didn't bring him; and after a great commotion, all the people that had got up to look for the culprit, sat down again. The little judge turned to the witness, as soon as his indignation would allow him to speak, and said,—

"Do you know who that was, sir?"

"I rather suspect it was my father, my lord," replied Sam.

"Do you see him here now?" said the judge.

"No, I don't, my lord," replied Sam, staring right up into the lantern in the roof of the court.

When the American Spiritualist shall once consent to take a fair look at the "remarkable article" it inquires about, we predict there will be a marked improvement in its power of vision.

WELCOME HOME!

The Morning Star, of Dover, N. H., has a warm and generous leader on the return of Hon. John P. Hale to his home in that city; and we copy elsewhere a similar noble tribute from the Watchman and Reflector, of Boston.

After more than four years absence at the Court of Spain, as Minister of the United States, this faithful servant of liberty, justice, and human rights, returns to his native country enfeebled by sickness and worn by public cares. Every lover of his race will remember with gratitude the services which John P. Hale rendered to the cause of humanity in the United States Senate, at a time when so many truckled to the slave-power, and when only he was "Faithful among the faithless found."

We rejoice at the cordial greeting extended to him by the press of the country, both "secular" and "religious;" and especially at the affectionate, hearty, and spontaneous reception tendered him by the city of his adoption. Never shall we forget the cordiality and kindness with which, in 1864, Mr. Hale welcomed a young, inexperienced minister to the Unitarian Society in Dover, and sought to make easy to him his new and untried duties; nor yet the prompt and ready assistance he volunteered at the time of Mr. Lincoln's assassination. In arranging for union meetings to conduct the Memorial Service appointed by the government, the Evangelical ministers of the place designedly excluded us from all participation in them. Seeing how matters stood, Mr. Hale came to us, and offered to make a public address to the people, if we would announce a meeting in the Unitarian church. We gladly consented; and the old brick church, which accommodates about a thousand people with ease, was so packed that chairs had to be brought into the aisles. It was the meeting of the day; the other churches had scarcely a corporal's guard, and for once sectarian bigotry was defeated of its end.

Remembering with keen gratitude the chivalry with which Mr. Hale then, as always, espoused the cause of the weaker party, we should be false to ourself, if we did not add our word of sincerest greeting to the acclamations of the nation; and, although we cannot in person grasp the hand of the worn and tired veteran, we do most warmly bid him welcome home to the land he so nobly helped to purify from its mountainous crime of slavery. Our heart beats with deeper love for America because he has lived; and we know we utter the wish of thousands upon thousands when we say,—"May his declining years be cheered and brightened by the well-earned gratitude of his fellow-citizens!"

WORSHIP OF THE IDEAL.

SYRACUSE, June 15, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Friend.—In all kindness and sincerity please allow me to ask you one question. In view of the fact that it is the highest duty and wisdom and act of man to worship his loftiest and most perfect ideal of Deity, although that be but a finite and therefore very imperfect conception of him, a mere symbolic thought or thing, and must ever be such, as the finite mind can never become infinite, how is the human race ever to escape idolatrous worship, to which this well-established principle seems to me to doom it?

Respectfully yours,

W. TWITCHELL.

[Worship, so far as it is mere sentiment or feeling, is not a "duty," since duty is limited to the domain of action. Our feelings do not depend on our wills, and cannot be changed by them; and nothing is a duty into which freedom of action does not enter as an element. If not free, we have no duties at all.

But so far as worship is action (and the truest worship is the devotion of all our powers to truth and justice and the service of man), it is a duty. In no other sense, in our opinion, is it a "duty" to worship God. Reverential adoration of the Infinite must gush forth spontaneously in the soul, as from an overflowing fountain; it cannot be pumped up by the sense of duty. The putting of the ideal into conduct and character is the only worship which is obligatory upon all; and many a man thus worships who is rarely or never conscious of the sentiment of adoration which is so beautiful when unforced.

Perhaps Mr. Twitchell's inquiry is answered by these considerations. There is no idolatry in such worship as is here indicated. The ideal is simply the highest conception of what we ought to be; it is not that which we worship. Is there any such thing as an "ideal of the Deity?" If this means a mental picture or representation of the formless Infinite, to worship it is certainly idolatry, as much so as to worship a statue or a painting. But if it means simply the highest thought of God that can be attained by the human mind, still it is not the thought itself that is intelligently worshipped, but rather that which the thought relates to. The thought, at the best, is but a glimpse of the Reality; and whoever remembers this, escapes the gross error into which the idolater, pagan or Christian, falls.—ED.]

THE HINDU REFORMER.

BROOKFIELD, June 14th, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT.—I do not know whether you have printed the little slip I sent you some days ago, concerning the Hindu reformer's views touching Christ and the Bible. I thought that since, in the statements you had published concerning him, his testimony touching these matters had been omitted, justice to all concerned required that a somewhat fuller and more adequate statement of Mr. Sen's views should be made than had as yet appeared in your columns.

In the meantime, you have, of course, perused the extracts from his addresses contained last week in the editorial columns of the Independent. It is a remarkable fact that those discourses, coming ostensibly from a heathen, are instinct with a far more fervid devotion to Christ than are the discourses of such leading free-religionists as Alger, Higginson and Conway,—born and bred Christians—receiving at first hand what Mr. Sen has received at two or three removes.

Meanwhile, it would appear that Mr. Sen must drink still deeper at this Fountain opened in the House of David, before he will have grace enough to treat his wife as his equal. Though being already, as I have intimated, somewhat in advance of some of our American Free Religionists in his attachment to Christ, his free-religion does not seem yet to have emancipated him from the heathen notion that women, not even wives, have any rights which their liege lords are bound to respect. A recent letter from India informs us that a missionary's wife, a class of persons Mr. Sen seems rather disposed to despise, had taught this very learned and eloquent reformer's wife to read,—the latter up to that time being ignorant of even the most ordinary facts of Scripture History. No other religion under heaven has exalted woman, disenthralled, lifted her to her true, heaven-ordained position, as the Gospel has done and is still doing, just in proportion as it flourishes in its purity.

Once more, allow me to say, I do not discover in anything you have said, concerning following Christ, any place for the advantages to be derived religiously from the power over us of a transcendent, or commanding character. Mr. Freeman Clarke, Mr. Matthew Arnold, and the author of "Ecco Homo" have elaborated this thought with great beauty and power, and any one at all acquainted with human nature will admit that we are governed not so much by precepts, as by the contagion of example, that a powerful character will impress itself upon others, not so much by virtue of certain formal testimonies, as by virtue of certain sympathies and personal attachments, and so impress itself by these means as to be forever a source of inspiration. There is no such source of inspiration as love-loyalty, and I see no place in your system for this motive. When you write about following Christ, you write as though Orthodox Christians advocated setting down before an external exemplar, and with perfectly cool faculties attempting to imitate it. This is not the Gospel plan at all. Our imitation of Christ is conducted under the influence and guidance of our inward impulse—a principle of interior and spiritual life—loyalty-love. There can be no bondage in such a case. Man is never so free as when tied up by love,—never so truly enslaved as when free from all trammels of personal attachment to One pure and holy. When is a man freer than when he finds his flagging energies re-enforced by an influx of impulse and sympathy from above, so that what he could not do simply from a hard, cold sense of duty, he can do under the influence of loyalty,—a soul-inspiring faith?

Finally, I cannot but think that, for the most part, that thing which you dislike, and which you call Christianity, is not Christianity at all, and is detested by Christians as well; while that which, when you come down to practical and tangible matters, you do love, and desire to see promoted among men, is exactly what we understand by Christianity—a disposition to love and serve God, and through the personal sympathy of Jesus, to die to self, and rise to God; to die to self and life for the sake of the salvation of men.

Yours Truly,

R. H. HOWARD.

[We cannot deny what Mr. Howard alleges of Mr. Sen's sentiments concerning woman, except so far as to say that the elevation of woman is one of the chief objects of the Brahmo-Somaj. We disbelieve the "letter from India," as probably a bigoted perversion of facts.

Does not Mr. Howard believe that Jesus is the Savior of the world? If so, he accepts the Christianity which we reject.—ED.]

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

MR. EDITOR:—Among a number of articles that have appeared in THE INDEX, which I should be glad to see published in a tract form, is that one in your issue of June 4th, on "Destruction and Construction." And if there be a Rock which is yet to grind all forms of Mediumism to powder, it seems to me it is fully described in the following paragraph:

"Instead of aiming at the building up of a system of definite beliefs, Free Religion plants principles in the mind, which alone can lead to truth. Confiding in reason, in thought, in science, in natural law, in natural growth, it does not seek to propagate special opinions, but to make the human mind so free from fear and prejudice and superstition, that its faculties may work untrammelled by the assumed necessity of defending any opinions. It seeks to create the LOVE OF TRUTH, rather than to spread abroad any particular truths."

The reasons, the foundations of virtue are found in the Relations of Life, which constitute a Bible, the pages of which each human being learns to read by those instincts which give the consciousness of filial love; these instinctive loves in each of the relations of life constitute a living law, which is always present within the conscious thought of every human soul. Man, therefore, is under no necessity of looking to any mediumistic revelations from another world for what it needs to know. Hence it is that humanity has always uttered its earnest protest against all forms of mediumism, ancient and modern, as it is the dividing line between Naturalism, Freedom, and Progression on the one side, and on the other Abnormalism, Visionary and Mediumistic revelations.

And here to show how very little humanity has to hope from the modern form of Mediumism, I may refer to a statement of the N. Y. Universe, in which its editor declared that modern Mediumism would be the Religion of the enlightened world, within thirty years! And to show you what this modern form of Mediumism is, I quote the following from the American Spiritualist of June 4, 1870. It is from the pen of one of the most popular lecturers in the ranks of this Mediumistic movement.

L. R. S.

The week closed with the meeting of the Free Religious Association; that singular hybrid creation of radical no-religion, intellectualism, and super-materialism; that brain without a soul; head without body or heart. Splendid head, splendid brain; but so pitiful to see it devoid of life. Ah, me! when men build a house from the roof downwards, what shall we expect? The first announcement of free religion is splendid, inspiring, satisfactory; and the promise to unite all faiths on one pivotal point of union—to search and find the underlying and connecting link of inspiration in all religions—is so soon followed with the absolute freedom of worship that one is really beguiled into hope. All religions, indeed! Have we not for years received the divine truth that all inspiration of all ages is from Heaven? That every nation, every age and all people, have been divinely guided, inspired and led? Have we not believed every thing? And when this grand catholic platform assumed shape in the form of "free religious association" who, so much as Spiritualists, hailed it and said, "welcome, thou long sought?" But is it true that all religions are here represented and allowed expression? From careful, candid and impartial attention during two of the three anniversary meetings, the writer is constrained to say, "give me rather the Mohammedan on bended knee worshipping at the sunset hour; give me the inspired and well preserved system of saints and spiritual gifts in the Romish Church, than this. No religion, but science—no God but natural law feebly defined—no soul but a floating vapor or "cloudy dream"—no immortality but a "guess," a "hope." In this day of facts and inspirations, of proofs and revelations, it is not only false but criminal to stand upon a platform professing "Free Religion," and welcome all dead religions of the past—useful for their time and generation; useful for the hour that gave them birth—and refuse the live, actual, breathing of working religions, to-day. Even Christianity is ignored by these iconoclasts who say, "Welcome Confu-cious Plato, Socrates, Moses—welcome Shaster, Vedas, Krim; but thou, Jesus, and thou, Sermon on Olivet, and ye, healers of the sick and possessors of spiritual gifts, ye are fables and cannot come."

Mr. Frothingham breathes a spirit of fine and subtle thought—like the odor of the lemon flowers, poetry, æsthetic taste, progressive ideas, perfect expression,—but soul is lacking, and that exalted knowledge that comes from conscious immortality being lost in the mazy labyrinths of "dream and hope."

Anything that breathes of religious fire or fervor—of spiritual knowledge or existence—is carefully cropped off from year to year; and soon we may expect to see a vast intellectual monster, with colossal towering brow and marble visage,—with all knowledge of material things, all sophism, and splendid mechanism of intellectual forms—fall tottering from its dizzy height, where egotism had placed it; where, without heart, or body, or the organs of life, it had vainly striven to simulate existence; and as it falls the fainting air will fold its wings over the ruin; and an invisible finger will trace on the shaft of the ages, "Dead, that which never lived, because it had no soul."

Whatever tends to a furtherance of human thought, to the culture of the entire being, shall survive, and all else shall be again wrought through the fiery furnace of creation, until each atom shall respond to the all soul.

CORA L. V. TAPPAN.

[To our surprise, the above strange misapprehensions of the character and spirit of the Free Religious movement received the following editorial endorsement from the American Spiritualist.—

"We call the attention of our many readers to the highly interesting and suggestive letter of Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan, in this issue of the Spiritualist. Her criticisms on the Free Religious Association are deservedly just."

We had supposed that our Cleveland friends had a better appreciation of the value of ideas. Ed.]

IS CHRISTIANITY ABSOLUTE RELIGION?

BY THOS. MCCLINTOCK.

[CONCLUDED.]

Adam Clarke says: "Under the Gospel, CHRISTIAN is the name of the people of this kingdom," and that this "will be the only denomination of the people of God while sun or moon endure."—But it is not the name that is of much value. It is the thing, the principle, to which the virtue coheres. And let it be observed, this Divine, intrinsic fact was but imperfectly perceived by the heralds of unfolding truth, in the apostolic churches. Hence Judaism and Heathenism mingled with what receives the name of Christianity, and have come down to us. And Adam Clarke spent much time and labor in defence of these and other extraneous and incongruous doctrines and practices. Now all this is to be sifted out, and, like the chaff of the summer threshing floor, carried away by the wind of Heaven, and nothing is to remain that is not in harmony with the perfections of Infinite God, and adapted to promote human perfection. "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect"—imitate his perfections—will forever "be the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus,"—in plain English, the "Anointed Savior"—which means nothing more nor less than the life-giving presence and power of the one unchanging God.

The Hebrew prophets—those worthy of the name—were the reformers and progressionists, the most spiritually minded of the tribes, and had frequent glimpses of the beauty and excellence of true absolute religion; but their belief in the Divine origin of their defective external Law constantly trammelled their minds, and absorbed their energies in the direction of sectarianism, and puerilities and dogmas, unworthy of man's nature and high destiny. This defect Jesus evidently saw, in the character of the Messiah the Jews were expecting, and the nature of the kingdom he was to establish. His efforts, therefore, from the beginning to the end of his ministry, appear to have been to direct their minds from the outward to the inward and spiritual. His prominent theme was embraced in the idea—"the glad tidings"—of "the kingdom of God at hand,"—near and waiting for every one, prepared by practical righteousness, by justice, pureness, sincerity, and love of God and man, to enter in and be blessed. It was to be established in them. "The kingdom of God is within you." It was "the reign of God," "the reign of the heavens,"—God's government of the conscious immortal soul. As the kingdom was within and spiritual, so the king or governor must be homogeneous, a spiritual Christ, in the highest acceptance of the term only to be found within.

That this was Jesus' view of the Messiah, we have a striking confirmation in the question put by him to the Pharisees: "What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he?" (Mat. 22: 42) or, as Campbell has it more correctly, "What think ye of the Messiah? Whose son should he be?" They answered, "David's." Here replied, "How then doth David, speaking by inspiration, call him his Lord? 'The Lord' saith he, 'said to my Lord, [literally, Jehovah said to my Lord—ADONAI.] sit at my right hand, until I make of thy foes thy footstool.' If the Messiah were David's son, would David call him his Lord?" This, it is added, "none of them could answer." Obviously because if the Messiah was David's son, and therefore an external human being—king or potentate—as the Jews expected, it would be beneath the dignity of David who was himself "the Lord's anointed king," to call his son his Lord, and altogether at variance with Jewish ideas.

But am I asked, was not Jesus personally the Christ? Certainly he was God's "anointed son," and in precisely the same sense that all good men and women, who are faithful to the law written in the soul, are Christs and sons or children of God, that is, spiritually "anointed ones," brought into filial relation with the Father; as was well expressed by Paul, "As many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God." "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Jesus, no doubt, was more highly anointed than any in that day, and probably in any preceding era; for the reason, that the work he had to do, and for which his devotion to spiritual influence fitted him, was higher—was in advance, in the progress of humanity, of what had fallen to the lot of any one that had preceded him. It was his mission to call men from the superficiality of religion, to the eternal reality of truth and goodness. But did he ever claim for himself, in any exclusive sense, either goodness or power, or any attainment to which he had arrived, or deemed within the limits of human possibility? I am not aware of one well authenticated instance of the kind. In this respect, he placed himself on a level with his fellow beings. It was his object to bring all to the perception and practice of the same truths that had been unfolded to him, by what he recognized to be the Father that dwelt in him. "The disciple," said he, "is not above his teacher, but every finished disciple shall be as his teacher." (Mat. vi; 40, Campbell's translation.) And his declaration as reported, is express and positive: "He that believes in me, the work that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go to my Father." What is it to believe in Jesus, but to have a just appreciation of his spiritual state of attainment, and a living faith in the Divine power by which that attainment was achieved? And a practical belief in this power, that operated in and through Jesus, would enable others to carry forward beyond what he had done, the work he had begun and which was interrupted by his death. The same spiritual power, he told his disciples, in his last impressive conversation with them, that had aided him, would be with and aid them, and more than compensate them for his physical separation from them. It was even "expedient" that he should go away. While with them as an external teacher, they were depending on him; and this kept them from having recourse to the only sufficient and unfailing Teacher. They must be thrown upon their own resources. And he left them in no doubt as to what they should have recourse to. "I will pray the Father, and he will send you another comforter, (or rather, "Monitor,") to continue with you forever, the spirit of truth," (John xiv: 15) called also, ver. 26, "the Holy Spirit." And again: "I have many things to say to you, but ye cannot hear them now. But when the spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." (xvi.) "He will convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." Can any religion claim a more perfect and comprehensive principle than this, which was the foundation principle of the Religion of Jesus? It was the "Spirit of Jehovah" (which he applied to himself in the passage from Isaiah before noticed,) by which he was "anointed." In other words, it was the Christ principle—God in action in man. The principle through the inspiration and power of which Jesus "went about doing good" to the bodies and souls of men. The same Divine principle through which only every act of real righteousness has been performed, both before and since his time. And it will remain one and the same, when the word Christ and its derivatives and correlatives shall have been superseded by terms more definite and philosophical, and less liable to misunderstandings and perplexities.

I will close this article with a short extract from the pen of that excellent man, the late Theodore Parker, whom I have regarded as the greatest mind living, of all his contemporaries:

"In an age of gross wickedness, among a people arrogant and proud of their descent from Abraham—a mythological character of some excellence,—wedded to the ritual Law, which they professed to have received by miracle from God, through Moses—another and greater mythological hero; in a nation of Monotheists, haughty, yet cunning, morose, jealous, vindictive, loving the little corner of space called Judea above all the rest of the world, fancying themselves the "chosen people" and special favorites of God; in the midst of a nation wedded to their forms, sunk in ignorance, precipitated into sin, and, still more, expecting a Deliverer who would repel their political foes, reunite the scattered children of Israel, and restore their power; conquer all nations; re-establish the formal service of the Temple in all its magnificent pomp, and exalt Jerusalem above all the cities of the earth forever,—amid all this, and the opposition it raised to a spiritual man, Jesus fell back on the moral and religious sentiment in man; uttered their oracles as the Infinite spoke through them; taught absolute Religion, absolute Morality, nothing less, nothing more; laid down principles wide as the soul, true and eternal as God."

PHILADELPHIA, 4th mo., 1870.

Once for laughing out loud at somebody's fun—one had only to put his tongue in his cheek, or to point a finger at us, to set off that laugh which always lay pent up, waiting for deliverance—we were tied to the leg of the bench. The acute pain of shame pierced like a knife—a kiss cured it. For a kind-faced girl, one of the elder young ladies finishing her education there, looked upon our tearful eyes and scarlet-blushing misery, took pity on us, put a soft hand on our head and stooped and kissed us. If a cup of cold water to a thirsty child shall bring immortal blessing to the giver, how much more a warm kiss to a crying child unable to defend itself against shame! May the angels lay their hands upon her as she dawns upon heaven, and kiss from her face every tear and sorrow of the sad world behind her!—H. W. BEECHER.

It is an old belief that one will lose his memory if he reads many inscriptions on grave-stones. Whoever occupies himself with what is departed and gone, loses the faculty of remembering what is needful for every-day life.

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE.

[From the Watchman and Reflector.]

The arrival home, last week, of the Hon. John P. Hale, after his five years absence, is an event which has created no little interest. The reception accorded him by the public authorities of his native city, and so enthusiastically participated in by all classes and political parties among its inhabitants, is only an expression of the general feeling which the announcement of Mr. Hale's return has begotten throughout New England.

We know of no finer tribute to the man's character than this generous ovation with which he is welcomed home. Mr. Hale has been one of the most prominent figures that have been engaged in the great arena of national politics during the mighty struggle of these last twenty-five years. A representative in Congress as early as 1843, he at once took position far in advance of the laggard sentiment of his day in hostility to slavery. That position he held during all the years of his subsequent service as United States Representative and Senator. With what boldness and unshaken courage did he bear himself! Scorn, and ridicule, and affected pity moved him not one whit more than did the subsequent tempest of rage, and denunciation, and violence which was let loose upon him. Both alike were wasted upon his imperturbable humor, his wondrous buoyancy, his profound conviction and unwavering faith.

The record of the man's public career, covering as it does the mightiest stadium in the nation's history, is certainly as bright and as fair as one can look upon. That it will take on an added brightness and beauty in the eyes of our children, when all the hates and prejudices begotten of this past shall have faded away, no one can for a moment doubt. The great men, as the coming future shall adjudge them, will be among the few heroic ones who in this really tragic period of the nation's history lifted themselves against the awful sin of slavery, fronting a whole people and the nation itself in their wicked defences of it. Upon whose brow "the all-justy future" will place one of its greenest laurels, it is by no means hazardous even now to foretell. Detraction, which has been so busy with his name, friendship, which has proved for him the hollowness of its nature, nothing of all the evil elements which are ever brooding for the marring of the finest characters, can at the worst do more than for a brief moment delay the homage of respect and affection with which John P. Hale, his character and service, will be everywhere saluted.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

[The N. Y. Tribune, June 20, publishes the following letters. They show how the people are coming face to face with the real question.—Ed.]

WAS CHARLES DICKENS A CHRISTIAN?

To the Editor of the Tribune.

SIR: There is a wide and very significant difference between conventional and practical Christianity. If belief in the dogmas or acquiescence in the forms of any church constitutes Christianity, then Mr. Dickens was not a Christian; but if ministering to the wants of the aged and afflicted, and extending the influence of great moral principles, furnish evidences of Christianity, then Dickens was a Christian indeed. Certain English people, some years ago, were greatly concerned about the Christianity of Garibaldi, because he appealed in one of his impassioned and patriotic speeches, to the "God of Reason." I think some religious people of England may to-day be found no less skeptical about Mr. Dickens.

For years I was connected with the press at Rochester, four miles from Gad's Hill, the country seat of Mr. Dickens. On Sundays he and his family occasionally indulged in cricket and other field sports, and entertained company, probably at the sacrifice of attendance at church. Beyond this, I do not believe the slightest imputation can be brought against him, except that his marital relations were not of the happiest. In the whole realm of England, the memory of no man will stand higher in the estimation of its people, for deeds of genuine Christian benevolence, than that of Charles Dickens.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 13, 1870.

THE CHRISTIANITY OF DICKENS AND OF WM. LLOYD GARRISON.

To the Editor of the Tribune.

SIR: There was a discussion several days ago in a convention as to whether Wm. Lloyd Garrison was a Christian, when an orthodox clergyman said: "I am forced to believe Mr. Garrison either a monster or a sublime Christian, otherwise he could not have stood his ground; and as I do not believe God makes monsters, I conclude that he must have derived his power from Christ. If a man may fight the devil as faithfully and effectually as Mr. Garrison has done and yet be an infidel, where is the need of Christianity?"

Can a man be so good himself and do so much good as Charles Dickens, by his works, has done, and will do, and yet not be a Christian?

THE REASON WHY.—A youngster, after deep meditation, broke out to his father: "Pa! I know why colored people have white palms to their hands and white soles to their feet. When the first colored man was made, he stood on all fours while God was painting him!"

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

[From the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.]

The meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, which will be held in New York next September, is attracting much interest in religious circles, and will be remarkable, among all previous assemblages of the kind on this side of the Atlantic, for the presence and participation of some of the most eminent of the representatives of evangelical religion in Europe. An exchange says:

"The preparations for the meeting have been under consideration for a long time, have been thoroughly matured, and extend to every part of the world where there are churches in sympathy with the objects of the proposed conference. The list of those from abroad who are expected to take part in it embraces representatives of the Universities of Berlin, of Geneva, of Florence, of Gotha, and of Halle; Rev. Edmund de Pressense, of Paris; Professor Tholuck, of Germany; Count Bernstorff, Count de Gasparin, Dean Alford, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and many others. Such an eminent assemblage of scholars and divines from abroad will of course attract an attendance from this side still more numerous. The consensus of articles of faith of the Alliance embraces the divine authority of the Old and New Testaments, the right of private judgment therein, the Trinity, the incarnation and the atonement, justification by faith, and eternal rewards and punishments. The special topics announced for discussion cover a wider range, and relate to the most effectual methods of counteracting infidelity and superstition, especially in their organized forms, the harmony of science and revelation, the religious aspects of popular education, the relations of Christianity to civil government, to philosophy, to social evils, to philanthropy, and to other great interests of mankind. It is the first meeting of the Alliance in this country, all the former meetings having been held in Europe, where the Association was formed twelve or fifteen years ago."

The Protestant Churchman says that the churches of all Protestant denominations have been assessed $25,000 to carry out the objects of the Evangelical Alliance, to meet in New York in September. A meeting of the Council of the Alliance took place on the 4th inst., at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, to consult on the best mode of raising the money. After prolonged discussion, a resolution was adopted to secure the Academy of Music, for the purpose of having a grand massing of the members of the churches of the various denominations to welcome the foreign delegates.

LOUIS XIV. AND INFALLIBILITY.

A writer in the "Intermédiaire des Chercheurs et des Curieux" states that he has found the following in a manuscript in the Imperial Library:—

"May 13, 1665.—The Nuncio had an audience of the king some days back, and complained of certain Parisian doctors of theology who spoke insultingly against the infallibility of the Pope. The king told him that he would follow the example of his predecessors, who had never interfered with the liberty of the Faculté de Théologie to utter and write their views upon matters connected with their own profession. After that the Nuncio presented to the king the Papal brief, telling him that it was very true that the Italian doctors taught the infallibility of the Pope and his superiority to a temporal Sovereign. The king returned answer that, if he had any of his subjects who taught this infallibility, he would chastise them in such style that others would have no desire to teach it afterwards, and that neither the Nuncio nor the Pope should prevent him. The King, while making this reply, had his arm raised and his fist closed. The Nuncio departed very much disconcerted. The Abbe Le Caums was one of those who noticed it first at the house of the Abbe de Coassin, where the Nuncio had just changed his court dress. The King went afterwards to the Queen Mother to tell her what had happened at the audience of the Nuncio, and among other things told her that he knew well who it was that was doing all this, and that, if these people annoyed him more, they should see what would happen."

A CURIOUS COIN.—Several large sarcophagi have been laid open to view in Athens. Last Saturday a very interesting one was found. I was present at the time. It was nearly empty, only some mould or earth on the bottom, but upon turning that over, and examining it carefully, what is found? The little thin scale of gold which it was the custom to put in the mouth of the dead to pay Charon his due—the obolus. Everything gone except this little leaf of gold, which was as bright and perfect in shape as when placed there. The coin called the obolus was the sixth of a drachma, and of silver; but the oboli of the dead, at least all that I have seen, were little round gold laminae. Distinctly impressed on the one above mentioned, though it is as thin as the paper I write on, are the owl, the caduceus of Mercury, and an overturned vase. There are also some letters—eight or ten in all—half of them distinct, but the others utterly undecipherable. Prof. Cummanudhes, one of the ablest of the archaeologists at Athens, says that this is the first funeral obolus, as far as his knowledge goes, which has been discovered bearing letters. He told me this afternoon that he had worked three hours upon it to-day, but could not decipher it. Quite likely, if the word which those letters formed could be read, it would be the name of the person in whose tomb it was found. How curious if this little scale should preserve to us the name of one so long dead!—The College Courant.

OUR ANNUAL MEETING THROUGH THE INDEPENDENT'S SPECTACLES.

The New York Independent, under the head of "Boston Theology"—using President McCosh's phrase—has the following sketch of the doings and doers at our late Annual Meeting. Of course we should not endorse it wholly; but it is well that the members and actors of the Association should see themselves as they are seen by a bright writer for that organ of liberal orthodoxy. There is a good deal of free religion in the Independent.

On Friday morning the Free Religious Association held its first meeting, in Tremont Temple, which was filled with an attentive congregation. The faces of many well-known thinkers and reformers were visible in the audience and on the platform; the mild radiance of Lucretia Mott's drawing more eyes, I thought, than any other. The Association assumes that its friends have unlimited powers of attention. Think of going to church six times a day, and listening to six different sermons, two of them an hour long!—though this is hardly a fair illustration, for sermons do not generally require very close attention, while three or four of the essayists brought forward by the Association required the closest following. In the course of the day, at least six carefully written essays were read to the audience. Besides these, there was a discussion in the afternoon and various other speeches. In fact, the plan of the Association for the day was to crowd a course of lectures and a discussion into ten hours; and, however it was with others, my brain began to have a feeling of incipient paralysis before the day was over, and I was fain to stop listening and admire the worldly wisdom of the Association in sending round such pretty girls to take up the contributions, for it was almost impossible to refuse them.

The Free Religious Association has evidently got bravely and wisely over its original assumption that Free Religion means a free platform; and on Friday, in the morning and the evening, everything was cut and dried. Carefully-prepared speakers were brought forward, and the fear of being swamped in a sea of incoherent and conceited gabble was forever taken away; for such will be the future policy of the Association, which, while tolerating the largest liberty of opinion, does not feel called upon to provide a platform for every wild declaimer who delights in hearing the sound of his own brazen clapper.

The president, O. B. Frothingham, made an opening address, in which he carefully reviewed the past of the Association, and made the clearest statement of its position that has yet been offered to the public. He announced the different basis above referred to—a basis which will exclude such persons as the Rev. Jesse Jones, who spoke last year, and whose speech was a defense of evangelicism, as such. The admission of such speakers in such a way would convert the platform of the Association into a battle-ground of the sects. All sects are invited, but not as sects. No person who worships his creed can properly belong to the Association; no person who believes it indispensable. Its members must be first Protestant, then sectarian; first Christian, then evangelical, or what not. Reviewing the different religions of the world, Mr. Frothingham then showed how they hold their own, making no sensible impression on each other. No one of them can expect to swallow up all the others. Free Religion does not affirm the indifference or the equality of religions. All religions have the sentiment of the infinite; but they have different ideals of life. The superiority of Christianity was asserted with great emphasis and beauty. But it is not the end. It is not the perfect circle, only the largest arc. It does not satisfy philosophy. It does not exhaust feeling. It does not harmonize with science. Until man is complete, religion must be incomplete. It is too intimately associated with mind to be independent of its growth. Mr. Frothingham closed his address with a series of brilliant antitheses, some of which had, perhaps, the vice of antitheses in general—sacrificing truth a little to brilliancy. In the course of them he seemed to forget his lecture of a few weeks since about the "unknown God," and talked as if he wasn't unknown at all, but well known, every new phase of human life being a revelation of him. Free Religion has principles, but no creed. It trusts wholly to reason. That is our steed. If it takes us to the Pope, let it; if to Calvin, let it; if to atheism, let it; though of this he had no fears. It might land us in somebody's notions of atheism. But every new era had done that, and left men nearer to God than ever.

Then came David A. Wasson. Do you know Wasson? He is profoundly metaphysical. Sometimes it is not easy to understand him; but the fault is inherent in his subject, not in his treatment of it. He is a born poet; and his "All's Well!" in the Atlantic Monthly is the best poem that ever graced the pages of that periodical. You will find plenty of traces of him in Theodore Parker's life and correspondence. Parker recognized his genius from the first. What he has done is no fair indication of his power; for he has been a sick man and a great sufferer all his life, and the story of it is written on his beautiful face—a face brimful of love and tenderness, with eyes that beam with a soft splendor and hold you with an indefinable charm. He spoke of "the place of religion among the great powers of the mind." A crowded hall was not the place for his discourse. It needed absolute quiet, for every word was important. "Religion," says Mr. Wasson, "is the sense that All is One. It is at the foundation of the mind. All rational thought, all morality, presupposes it. Life presupposes it. To live in a human or inhuman world would be unendurable." This essay was the great event of the morning. It began quietly and almost coldly; but as it went on it soared and sang, and the whole audience was filled with calm emotion. It was a statement that any religious man of any sect might have rejoiced in with unadulterated joy.

Mrs. Ednah Dean Cheney, who came next, spoke of the relation of Free Religion to reform; and she spoke so well that all the friends of woman's suffrage who were present probably winked at her heresy. She is a woman, every inch of her; and her inches are many in height and in breadth of figure. She smooths her glossy gray hair over an ample forehead, from under which shine out such luminous eyes as one doesn't see often. It would be hard to say whether her voice or smile is sweeter; and, though she said many things that must have been painful to orthodox ears, how they could have been said at all and said less painfully I cannot conceive. She thought Free Religion much better adapted to reform than the prevailing ecclesiasticism: first, because it more clearly recognized the dignity of human nature; then, because of its cordial alliance with science. And the great lesson of her essay was—a lesson that all Christendom can afford to take—that, whatever the motives of reform, its methods must be scientific. The lesson she enforced with the utmost sweetness, and with many admirable illustrations. All sorts of people were impressed by what she said and how she said it.

Mr. Abbot, the next speaker, needs no introduction to the American public. He is already very well known. Somehow his immense forehead seemed a little more protuberant than it was a year ago. He spoke of church organization, gave his reasons for thinking the present organization weak, then told how much of it he thought would perish and how much would survive. As usual, he said many hard things about Christianity. And Mr. Wasson's objection to Abbot's idea of God—that he defines by the inferior limit—holds even truer against his definitions of Christianity. What he calls Christianity plenty of Christians hate as much as he. But there is something else called Christianity which he loves as much as anybody, and which is Christianity indeed. Yet there is something very touching in the attitude of this man, who courageously attacks the strong in-trenchments of the popular religion. One thing must in justice be said of him; he is no scoffer. His harshest words are spoken in the most earnest and reverent spirit.

The afternoon session was devoted to a free discussion of the question of the Bible in the public schools, which was opened by Rev. Mr. Vickers, of Cincinnati, one of the most prominent of the excursionists in that city. If his speech on Friday was a fair sample of his public speaking, he appears better in print than in person. He is a man of most undoubted culture and ability, as his controversy with Archbishop Purcell well proved, wherein he used up the Bishop most effectually, fairly burying him beneath a mass of historic learning such as not one clergyman in a thousand is master of. But on Friday it was his misfortune in some respects to be fresh from the Cincinnati controversy, and to bring with him its personal animosities. His speech was too controversial in its tone; but he made many capital points, and quoted Thomas Jefferson with terrible effect against his opponents. The discussion that followed his remarks was not a debate, everybody agreeing with him except one good-hearted, but fearfully weak-minded person, who popped up last year at the same meetings, to as little purpose.

By far the most original speech of the afternoon was made by Rev. John L. Russell, of Salem, an ex-minister of the Unitarians, who made it very plain that for good or evil the evangelical denominations have things pretty much their own way in the Normal Schools of the State. As he went on, he became more and more eloquent, and all the quaintness of his manner was forgotten. Very sweet it was to see Lucretia Mott upon the platform, and to hear her earnest utterance, which, however radical, is so earnest and tender that one is not so much shocked by it as he feels he ought to be. Very radical it is. There is none more so. There she stood, and dreamed her dream of a renewed and glorified humanity. And, as it shaped itself upon her lips, it was easy to have faith in its not-far-off consummation. Other speakers were Rowland Connor and Calthrop, now of Syracuse, who for a time occupied Parker's pulpit in Boston—a man of most unequal performances, not a fierce radical by any means, fond of putting new wine into old bottles, new truth into old phrases; seemingly incapable of saying a harsh thing of anything or anybody, almost literally "thinking no evil." He spoke with great simplicity, right to the point, and made a capital impression.

The great event of the morning was Wasson's essay. The great event of the evening and of the day was Samuel Johnson's lecture on the Natural Sympathy of Religions. It was full of learning and admirable in its spirit. Mr. Johnson is almost as much of a come-outer as Mr. Abbot, but is much less astonished at the novelty of his position. He has occupied it quietly for about twenty years, living a studious life in Salem, and preaching to a small congregation in Lynn. His face is very like the pictures of Tennyson. He graduated with O. B. Frothingham, who was then intensely conservative. I cannot report his essay. It traced through all the great religions their sympathy of faith in the unity of God—finding this underlying Polytheism and Pantheism—in the union of faith with freedom, in sacrifice, in incarnation, in immortality. He was followed by Rabbi Wise, of Cincinnati—a rather dingy-looking but unique and interesting person, a radical Jew, confident that his religion is Free Religion, and nothing else, if rightly interpreted. Higginson spoke for Mohammedanism, but just a little spitefully against Christianity, and hardly to the point, which was the sympathy of religions. Potter and Channing, who came after, came too late for me to hear them. I had never heard so much talk before in one day; and, good as it was, I hope I never shall again.

The one impression left upon me by these meetings was that of their profoundly religious character. If they were not Christian, they were certainly religious; for I believe that no person whose opinion is worth anything believes that all the religion is inside of Christianity. I could not resist the impression that these were good men, in terrible earnest, perfectly true to their own convictions; and, for fear of not being so, sometimes overstating their unpopular opinions. I was convinced that the time has passed for meeting such men with nicknames and anathemas; that they must be met on their own grounds, with thoughtful argument. His faith in God cannot be very strong who thinks that, if these men are working for the truth, they can in the long run do anything against it.

NOTICE—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHANDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, FROE, DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

"It is a vulgar error, copied and repeated from one book to another," says A. R. Wallace, "that in the tropics the luxuriance of the vegetation overpowers the effort of man. Just the reverse is the case. Nature and the climate are nowhere so favorable to the laborer, and I fearlessly assert that here the 'primeval' forest can be converted into rich pastures and meadowland, into cultivated fields, gardens, and orchards, containing every variety of produce, with half the labor, and, what is of more importance, in less than half the time, that would be required at home, even though there we had clear, instead of forest ground to commence upon."

FEMALE FASHION REFORM.—A Parisian journal tells us that a number of ladies have formed themselves into a society for the purpose of reforming the fashions; that is to say, to reduce the present extravagant expenditure on dress. They call their association "L'Union des Femmes Chrétiennes." Each lady promises to spend so much and no more on her toilette annually, and to pay ready money.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

[An evening lecture delivered in Toledo, Sunday, Aug. 1, 1869.]

About a week ago, there was published, in the two daily papers of this city, a sermon upon the "observance of the Sabbath." Its author is a well-known clergyman of this place, whose reputation stands high as a faithful minister to his people, and as a man active in works of practical humanity. If the sermon had not been committed to the public press, and thus widely circulated, there would be no occasion for any reference to it. But its publication shows that it was designed to reach, not a particular congregation alone, but the community in general; and it thus assumes the character of a public document. Every appeal to public opinion is a fair subject of public comment; and when it concerns a matter of grave practical importance, public comment is inevitable. Every question has two sides, and both sides may rightfully claim a fair, impartial hearing. The sermon referred to states the ecclesiastical side of the Sunday question, and thus justifies and demands a counter-statement of the liberal side. It is with some reluctance that I, almost an entire stranger in this city, and unconnected as I am with any organized society, have consented to undertake the delicate task of a reply—a task, however, which, under the circumstances, appears to be a duty. Nothing is farther from my wish and purpose than to enter on any personal controversy; and, while I intend to speak with perfect plainness, I trust I shall be found to speak with equal courtesy. The Sunday question is looming up in the future as a great public issue, and it is incumbent on every lover of his race to do all in his power to secure its right settlement. The frankness and directness of the sermon command my respect; and this I can show in no more appropriate way than by being equally frank and direct.

What, then, are the leading points of the sermon which demand attention? In substance they are these:—

1. That the recent Sunday celebration of the Fourth of July by the Germans was a desecration of the Christian Sabbath, and a violation of the law of the land.

2. That it is the duty of our foreign-born population to accept our institutions, including the Sabbath observance of Sunday, precisely as they find them; that to seek to change them, or substitute institutions of their own, is an outrage on the rights of the home-born.

3. That the conduct of the Mayor of the city, in sanctioning the Fourth of July celebration by his presence and participation, is a flagrant breach of the law by the officer specially entrusted with its execution, and alarmingly threatens the peace and safety of the city.

4. That these facts teach all Christian men to vote only for such candidates as share their own opinions concerning the Sabbath observance of Sunday.

I propose this evening to inquire into the correctness of these, the leading points of the sermon, beginning with the second. The first involves a discussion of the legal and Scriptural aspects of the Sunday question, and will be more conveniently postponed for a while.

With what justice, then, is it declared to be the duty of our foreign-born population to accept our institutions as they are, without endeavoring in any way to change, reform or improve them? Why must we regard home-born Americans as entitled to peculiar rights and privileges not granted to foreign-born Americans? The distinction is out of date. The time has gone by for urging the superior claims of a portion of the American people, based on the accidents of color, race or birth-place. Once naturalized, the foreigner is as completely and truly an American citizen, as is the descendant of the Pilgrim Fathers. The rights and the duties of all Americans, as such, are the same. The law knows no distinction among them, or at least ought to know none; and the day is rapidly approaching when all distinctions which confer superior privileges upon a class, will vanish away forever.

If the institution of the so-called "Christian Sabbath" has no better foundation than the claim of native-born Americans to especial deference, it is built upon the sand. There shall, indeed, be "one law" to the home-born and foreign-born; but it shall be the law of equal rights ordained by a majority of the whole people—not the law of unequal privilege, imposed by one portion of the people upon another portion. The institutions of the home-born are no more sacred than those of the foreign-born; all institutions, in a free country, exist but by the will of the majority, and may rightfully be changed by the same power which has created them. It is idle to plead the exceptional rights of any fraction of the people, or the especial sanctity of any institution in America. The sermon refers approvingly to the abolition of slavery. But how was this brought about, if not by the armed invasion of Northern men into the South, and the forcible subversion of that "peculiar institution of the home-born?" Foreigners coming from abroad believe that they find here a species of social and ecclesiastical slavery which they wish to abolish; what should prevent them from making the attempt? When they have become naturalized, they have the same right to attempt the abolition of the Sunday-Sabbath which we had to attempt the abolition of slavery. There is no help for it—all institutions in America must stand by their intrinsic merits, or else be overthrown. The only way to prevent the abolition of the Sunday-Sabbath is to convince the people that it is founded on truth and utility, not to appeal to some imaginary peculiar right of the "home-born." Here, in America, all institutions, like all men, must have a fair and equal chance, no more; and then let the best win!

But who are the "home-born?" There is not today a single "home-born" American in Toledo. The Indians are the only "home-born Americans." When our Puritan ancestors landed on these shores, did they, the foreign-born, accept the institutions of the "home-born" as they found them? Far from it; they destroyed the institutions and the "home-born," too. It excites a smile when the descendants of the Puritans claim for their own imported institutions special rights or immunities, on the score of native production. The same principle which is made to condemn the abolition of the Sunday-Sabbath would condemn equally its introduction and establishment. It would still more emphatically condemn the sending of missionaries to India and Burmah, avowedly for no purpose but to subvert the institutions of the "home-born" and to plant ours in their stead. The author of the sermon fails to see that the missionaries whom he helps to send abroad interfere with the institutions of the "home-born," in Ceylon, far more than the Germans interfere with ours. No right of the "home-born" is infringed in either case. If our institutions are really better than those of the Hindus, we do right in seeking to introduce them into India; and if the institutions of the Germans are better than ours, they do right in seeking to introduce them here. The question turns wholly on the comparative worth of foreign and native institutions, and this must be determined solely by the appeal to experience and common sense. There is no law of reason or right by which any institution can pre-empt the ground.

But in assuming to speak for the "home-born" Americans, the sermon assumes too much. I doubt greatly whether one-third of them believe in the Sabbath observance of Sunday. Certainly a very large proportion of native Americans hold views on the Sunday question quite as liberal as those of the Germans, nor are they indebted to the Germans for them. Common reason has taught both. The debate on the Sunday question is not between Americans on the one hand and Germans on the other, but rather between conservatives and liberals throughout the world. The line of demarcation is by no means one of race or birth. The fathers of this republic were found on both sides of it; and if the strongest and most influential minds among them had not been largely imbued with free thought, our American government, instead of being the freest in the world, would have become what Massachusetts, my native State, once was,—a Christian commonwealth in which church-members alone could vote. The sermon relies too confidently on the orthodoxy of the men who founded the republic. The man whose writings, according to Lossing, made the "earliest and most powerful appeal in behalf of independence, and probably did more to fix that idea in the public mind than any other instrumentality," was no other than Thomas Paine, the boldest free-thinker of the time. It was Thomas Jefferson, another free-thinker, who laid the cornerstone of American liberty by writing the immortal "Declaration of Independence," and of whom Bancroft says, "From the fulness of his own mind, without consulting one single book, Jefferson drafted the Declaration," (vol. 8, p. 465). Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and many another who did yeoman's service in building up the American Republic, were also free-thinkers; and it is to these, and men like these, that America owes to-day the religious liberty she enjoys. But for their influence Christianity would be now the established religion of the State, and we should be hampered with oppressive Sunday laws, Church taxes, and many other burdens from which we are free. No day of the week is too sacred to celebrate the memory and services of men like these; and so far from grieving that our German fellow-citizens are moved to celebrate the anniversary of our Independence on Sunday, we ought rather to rejoice that they have been moved to celebrate it at all; that they have so completely caught the spirit of patriotic enthusiasm as to love and honor the birthday of our common country.

When such men as Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, and their compeers, were foremost among the achievers of American Independence, it is idle to claim their authority for the perpetuation of Sabbath superstitions. "Home-born" Americans, quite as earnestly as their foreign-born brethren, demand freedom from ecclesiastical rule. It is not the spirit of Germany alone, but the spirit of the age, that refuses to submit to ecclesiastical ideas. Whatever stands in the way of freedom,—intellectual, social, political and religious freedom—will most assuredly be swept under the wheels of her onward-moving car. There can be but one law to the home-born and the foreign-born in America, and that is the one law of liberty, limited only by the law of equal rights. Every man must be free to observe Sunday as he pleases, according to the dictates of his own conscience and reason; and the only check upon his liberty must be the equal right of his neighbors to observe it as they shall please. One man has no right to disturb others, on Sunday or any other day, in their innocent pursuits; but others have no right to be disturbed by him, merely because he may not think as they think, or choose to act as they act. It disturbs some men very much not to be allowed to govern other men just as they please; but the more they are disturbed in this way, the better for all concerned. By disturbance, I mean wanton or unnecessary disturbance; and with this understanding of the word, the true principle is as follows: Let every man do as he pleases on Sunday, provided he forbears to disturb others. All public worship must rest on the voluntary support of those who believe in it; and no worshiper has any ground of grievance if he is allowed to worship free from interruption. To require more than this freedom from interruption—to be offended because other people elsewhere choose to amuse themselves while he worships—to seek to impose his own narrow notions on a whole community—is neither more nor less than bigotry. Whatever interferes with public quiet or order should be suppressed, of course; but a spirit of mutual forbearance and a charitable allowance for variation in tastes and temperaments, will wonderfully reduce the number of offences that demand suppression.

America does not stand for the liberty of the "home-born;" it stands for the liberty of all within its borders; and all, whether "home-born" or foreign-born, have an equal right to labor for the improvement of its institutions. If I thought that the American people desired emigrants from abroad solely for its own good, and not for their equal good; if I thought it presumed to "invite" foreigners to settle here without offering them in a few years an equal voice in its government; if I thought the "home-born" meant to impose their own ideas and customs on the foreign-born, against their will, and thus "invite" them here as coolies, not as citizens, I should blush for my native land. What business have we to "invite" any one here, or to talk about the "terms of our invitation?" The German or the Frenchman, the European, the African, the Asiatic, has precisely the same right to come here that my own Puritan ancestors had. America belongs to all who love freedom enough to trust their fortunes and lives under her free government; and it would be simply arrogance for me to expect from the new comers any peculiar deference for my prejudice or my superstition. Here all men, all institutions, all ideas, all religions, must meet on one level, and stand or fall by the free verdict of the people; the bad will go the wall, the good will flourish. Whoever dares not trust the good sense and good conscience of freedom's verdict, lives uninspired by the great faith of the New World—faith in man and his dazzling destiny.

But a specific charge is made in the sermon, that the Sunday celebration of July 4th was an open violation of the law; and that the Mayor of the city, the officer specially entrusted with the execution of the law, aided and abetted its public infraction. These are accusations of the gravest nature, and can be warranted only by indisputable facts. To bring a charge of defiant lawlessness against a class of the population which has always borne the highest reputation for good conduct and cheerful obedience to the laws, and, above all, to impeach the chief officer of the city at the bar of public opinion as an accomplice in the crime, is either an act of great heroism or of great injustice. If the accusation can be sustained, the gratitude of the whole community is due to the accuser for his fearless denunciation of corruption in high places; but if it cannot be sustained, the censure of all unprejudiced and fair-minded men is equally his due for a rash and illiberal assault on the reputation of worthy citizens. Let us first consider the actual facts in the case; then, by a comparison of the facts with the statute which is alleged to have been infringed, we may approximate to a just conclusion in the matter.

If I have been correctly informed, no church in this city has regular worship in the afternoon; and so far as I have been able to learn, only one or two hold their Sunday Schools at that time. It was the common understanding and intention, I am told, of those who were to participate in the celebration, and especially of the Committee appointed to superintend it, that no church should be passed on the route selected, and that the procession should be so conducted as to occasion no disturbance to the inhabitants. With these intentions and feelings, the Committee designedly chose the afternoon as the time of the demonstration, contrary to the usual practice; and orders were issued to avoid passing all churches whatever. No noise was made in the marching of the procession through the streets, except the music of the band. On arriving at Lenk's Park, a retired part of the city, there was music by the band, firing of cannon, speeches and public readings, and similar manifestations of rejoicing. But I have been distinctly informed that no guns or pistols were discharged, except by some irresponsible individuals; as happens usually on the Fourth of July, even when no public demonstration takes place. For this, of course, the Committee and the procession were no more responsible than they were for the firing of crackers by American or Irish boys in back-yards and alleys. Good order prevailed at the Park, and I have heard of no cases of intoxication or boisterous conduct. By an oversight much regretted by the Committee, the procession, contrary to the plan adopted, passed through Madison street, not knowing that the Methodist Sunday School was in session; and this appears to be the only disturbance occasioned to the occupants of churches. My inquiries have convinced me that the spirit of the demonstration was unexceptionable, free from all desire and intention to disturb or annoy. It was an honest celebration of the day for the day's sake, not the defiant outburst of a seditious or quarrelsome disposition. For half an hour or so, I was present at the Park with a friend, during the latter part of the afternoon, though I heard and saw nothing of the procession, and I witnessed no demonstration contrary to the strictest decorum. These, to the best of my knowledge and belief, are the actual facts in the case.

The statute protecting the Sunday as a day of rest provides, that "if any person of the age of fourteen years or upwards shall be found on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, sporting, rioting, quarreling, hunting, fishing, or shooting," or "at common labor (work of necessity and charity only excepted)," he or she shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. This is the whole substance of the statute, omitting certain specified exceptions not necessary to be here mentioned. There is no law forbidding the celebration of July 4th when it occurs on Sunday; and the alleged illegality of the late demonstration is made to rest, in the sermon under consideration, solely upon the interpretation of the word "shooting," as including the firing of cannon in token of public rejoicing.

Now the United States is, properly speaking, neither a Christian nor a Pagan country; it is simply a free country, and recognizes no union of Church and State. It establishes no religion, and prohibits none, but accords to all religions equal rights and privileges. Although in some of the States, as, for instance, Pennsylvania, and, I believe, New York, Christianity has been ruled to be a part of the common law, the constitution of Ohio, like that of the Federal Union, is perfectly neutral with regard to different religions. Christianity, therefore, as ruled by Judge Thurman in the case of Bloom vs. Richard (Ohio State Reports, vol. II, p. 387, et seq.), is no part of the law of this State. It is also ruled in the same case that the statute "prohibiting common labor [and shooting] on the Sabbath, could not stand for a moment as a law of this State, if its sole foundation was the Christian duty of keeping the day holy, and its sole motive to enforce the observance of that duty.

We are, then, to regard the statute under consideration as a mere municipal or police regulation, whose validity is neither strengthened nor weakened by the fact that the day of rest it enjoins is the Sabbath day. These rulings of the Supreme Court must be borne in mind, for the sermon gives the impression, although somewhat vaguely, that the statute enforces the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath. This is not the case. It enforces the observance of Sunday simply and solely as a day of rest; and it must be itself regarded as a "mere municipal or police regulation." It is vain, therefore, to claim the authority of State law, as is apparently done, for the Sabbath observance of Sunday. This must be defended, if defended at all, on Scriptural grounds alone.

The grave charge, therefore, of a flagrant violation of the law of the State, hinges entirely on the mere technical construction of a single word. It is not the spirit of the statute to protect Sunday as the Sabbath; but that is the spirit of the accusation. The celebration, consequently, regarded as a desecration of the Sabbath, was no violation of the statute. If illegal at all, it was the infraction of a "mere municipal or police regulation," prohibiting "shooting" on a particular day of the week; and of no more heinous a character than the act of tying a horse to a lamp-post, which is also prohibited by a "municipal regulation." It is altogether futile, therefore, to seek to elevate the infraction of a mere police rule into the importance of a crime against the State. At the worst, it is one of those trifling peccadilloes of which every man is occasionally guilty, and furnishes a very slender basis upon which to rear so startling an invective.

At the same time, this trifling peccadillo assumes quite serious proportions, if proved upon the highest executive officer of the city, and shown to be an act of defiant and deliberate lawlessness. No man should accept the office of Mayor, if unable conscientiously to execute all the laws; but, having once accepted it, he is in duty bound conscientiously to execute them all. No discretion is allowed to him; no liberty to execute some and leave others unexecuted. I should, therefore, regard it as a very grave offence, and a very bad augury for the future of Toledo, if the mayor had really and designedly become an accomplice in the violation of even the least important of police regulations. We ought to inquire, therefore, with some anxiety, how much foundation exists for the accusation of the sermon.

The Sunday statute, whose substance I have already given, is a penal statute, affixing a certain penalty to certain acts. It is a recognized principle of law that the language of penal statutes shall not be twisted or extended beyond its obvious meaning. "Penal statutes," says the Ohio Digest of Supreme Court Reports, p. 573, "must be strictly construed. They cannot be extended by implication to cases not strictly within their terms." The whole question, therefore, is reduced to this: does the firing of cannon come strictly within the natural and obvious meaning of the word "shooting" taken in its connection in the statute? I think not. The statute forbids "sporting, rioting, hunting, fishing, or shooting on Sunday." Taking in connection with the adjoining words, "hunting" and "fishing," I think the word "shooting" means merely the discharge of a gun or pistol, either at game or a target, or for the sake of the noise. The firing of pistols by individuals in the neighborhood of the Park, on the Fourth of July, was perhaps an infraction of the statute. But this the Mayor neither did himself nor sanctioned in others. The only firing he sanctioned was that of cannon, not for amusement or for the killing of game, but in joyful commemoration of perhaps the greatest event in all history, the foundation of the Great Republic upon eternal and universal ideas. It was for a purpose worthy of the respect and sympathy of every lover of freedom throughout the world; and so far from desecrating the day, it made the day sacred, by giving expression to the most sacred sentiments of the human heart. If, at a military funeral held on Sunday, it is no desecration of the day, no violation of the true intent of the statute, to fire a volley over a hero's grave in token of sorrow and respect, still less is the firing of cannon a violation of the statute, when discharged in honor of American independence and the liberty of man. For the discharge of musketry is more plainly within the scope of the word "shooting" than is the discharge of cannon. I conclude, therefore, at least until corrected by a decision of the Court, that the Mayor was not even guilty of a technical infraction of a mere police regulation—much less of a high crime against the State; and that the startling accusation of the sermon dwindles away into an overstrained and perverted use of a mere technicality.

When, consequently, on no broader grounds than this rash and unjust accusation, a solemn appeal is made to all "Christian men" to vote for no candidates who are not pledged to the support of Sabbatarian views, the appeal has no force whatever, except as illustrating the natural antagonism between orthodoxy and civil freedom. Here is an open attempt, on the part of the Church, to get control of political power, for the purpose of using it in the interests of orthodox theology. Nothing but the plainest speech will answer in a case of this sort. When, contrary to the fact, the authority of the State is claimed for the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath, thus making it appear that Christianity is a part of the common law,—when, furthermore, the Christian community is solemnly warned to vote only for men who will enforce the law as thus perverted,—there is cause for determined protest on the part of all who value Republican ideas and institutions. Christianity has as many rights in Ohio as Paganism has, and no more; they stand on a perfect equality before the law, according to the explicit ruling of the Supreme Court of the State. Sunday is legally no more the "Sabbath" than Monday or Tuesday is,—this also according to the ruling of the Supreme Court of the State. The spirit and letter of Ohio law wholly ignore theology, whether Christian or Pagan; and it is violation of official duty when any officer allows his public action to be influenced by his private creed. Yet men are now solemnly urged to vote for him alone, who will enforce the Sunday statute as interpreted by the Sabbatarian creed of orthodoxy. It remains to be seen how much response an appeal of this sort will meet in the Christian community; but when the American people become once convinced that Christianity is incompatible with religious liberty, the days of Christianity are numbered. I should very much regret to see the truth or falsity of Christianity voted upon at the polls; I should very much prefer to see that question raised and answered outside of party politics; but if anything can precipitate the issue, or compel the nation to choose between Christianity and liberty, it is just such appeals to "Christian men" as that contained in the sermon. Nothing could do more to intensify American jealousy of ecclesiastical encroachments than this undisguised attempt to introduce a little orthodoxy into the public administration of law. The sword is double-edged, and will cut both ways. Those who value Christian institutions will do wisely not to bring them into open conflict with civil liberty.

Least, however, what I have said may seem to imply that I am in favor of repealing all Sunday laws, when I am only opposed to Sabbath laws, I ought to say that I think the institution of a weekly holiday for rest, recreation, and culture in the highest directions, a great public benefit. In America, especially, where competition is so intense and business so engrossing, one day in seven is only too little to be saved from the treadmill of the week. Sunday is pre-eminently the poor man's friend. The rich have greater leisure and greater variety of occupation; they are not tied down to one unvarying round. But the poor man, exhausted and worn by the week's work, which is usually a grinding routine with but little change, needs more than any one a quiet day of refreshment, enjoyment and culture. No man is above this need of a weekly holiday; and it is simply common sense to secure all in the enjoyment of it by protective statutes. On this universal need of rest, recreation, and the higher culture, is based the institution of the Sunday; and whatever statutes are necessary to make it a quiet, happy, and improving day to all, if regarded as mere police regulations, are sound in principle and just in practice. But the utmost to be aimed at by the Sunday statute is to protect, not to direct. How Sunday should be spent, whether at prayer or at croquet, whether in the church or in the woods, is no concern of the law, provided no one is molested or disturbed by his neighbors. I am inclined to think that our Sunday law, in some particulars, might be wisely modified still further; but, since this is merely a question of expediency concerning the best rules of police, there is no reason to complain of a false principle in the case. The Ohio law does not treat the Sunday as a Sabbath, and does not recognize its alleged sacred character; but all its provisions are made for the simple and sole purpose of establishing a uniform day of rest. Every man is left free to employ the day as he pleases, according to his own conscience or taste, provided he disturbs nobody else; and I do not see how any one need ask a wider liberty. The object to be aimed at is to keep the liberty we have got.

The charge of "desecration of the Christian Sabbath," however, still remains to be examined. This charge presupposes several propositions of a general character:—

1. The Sabbath is sacred, but can be desecrated.
2. Sunday is the Sabbath.
3. The observance of Sunday as the Sabbath is a part of Christianity.

In the briefest possible way (for I have occupied too much of your time already), let me examine these propositions.

No one knows the true historical origin of the Sabbath. In the book of Genesis, the Lord is said to have blessed the seventh day, Saturday, because on that day, having finished the creation of the world in six days, he "rested and was refreshed" (Exod. 31: 17). The sacredness is supposed to come from the Lord's blessing: Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, and the rest, did not become sacred, because they were not blessed. All this is childish enough. If, however, the Lord blessed the Sabbath—made it sacred—surely no man can unless it, or "desecrate" it. But if man is able to desecrate it, or destroy its sacredness, then the Sabbath must be by this time quite as profane as the rest of the week. However this may be, it is a fact that the Jews believed Saturday to be sacred, and at last protected its rigid observance as a Sabbath by very stringent laws.

But how comes it that the Sabbath is now Sunday, and not Saturday? The orthodox answers to this question are very lame; Nowhere in the whole Bible is the name Sabbath applied to the first day of the week; it always signifies the seventh day. In vain will you search for a single text stating that the Lord's blessing was transferred from Saturday to Sunday; in vain will you search for a single text teaching men to observe Sunday as a Sabbath. The Fourth Commandment has no more to do with Sunday than it has with Thursday. For the mistaken notion that Sunday is the Sabbath, not a single text in the Bible can be adduced as proof. About three centuries after Christ, Athanasius asserted that "the Lord changed this day from the Sabbath to the Sunday;" and the doctrine of the Sabbath observance of Sunday can get no weightier authority than the simple tradition of the Church—an authority repudiated by all Protestants. Those who really follow the teachings of the Bible on the matter, like the Seventh Day Baptists, observe Saturday, not Sunday, as their Sabbath.

Taking the Bible, therefore, as the only Christian authority, Protestant ministers ought to preach that the Sabbath observance of Sunday is no part of Christianity; no duty, therefore, of Christians. For some reason they have ceased to preach this, and adopt all sorts of devices to prove the contrary. This question whether the Sabbath observance of Sunday is a part of Christianity, came up recently in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; and Chief Justice Read, admitting that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law of Pennsylvania, nevertheless decided (for he took the trouble to investigate the matter honestly and thoroughly) that "the Sunday of the Christian world is not the Jewish Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment, and such was the declared opinion of Luther, Calvin, and the early reformers."

Chief Justice Read is right. Although I do not claim to be a Christian myself, and feel obliged to stand outside of Christianity altogether, I nevertheless wish to do justice to Christianity, and not lay at its door the follies and inconsistencies of Sabbatarianism. Jesus was himself an open "Sabbath-breaker," and was hated by the Jews on this account. "This man," said they, "cannot be of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day." Paul emphatically declared, "Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of any holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days, which are a shadow of the things to come; but the body is of Christ." And, again, "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." And so, frequently, in other places. The strongest possible statements against the Sabbath observance of Sunday can be found, by any one who will take the trouble to investigate, in Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, Bucer, Beza, Zwinglius, Cranmer, Milton, Knox, Paley, Jeremy Taylor, Dr. Arnold, Archbishop Whately, William Penn, Bishop White, the late Dr. Alexander, of the Presbyterian church, and a whole host of the highest authorities. Why, then, do Christian ministers assume the unnecessary defence of the Sabbath observance of Sunday? Sunday is as good as Monday, if as well employed—otherwise not. It is no part of Christianity to keep it holy; much less of Free Religion. All days should be kept holy alike, by manly and womanly lives; but to reverence Sunday as any better than Tuesday or Friday, is superstition alone.

Mohammedans say that one hour of justice is worth seventy years of prayer, one act of charity is worth a century of eloquence.

PRISONS OF THE INQUISITION.

A writer in the Galaxy, who appears formerly to have been a Roman Catholic priest, thus describes the horrible prisons of the Inquisition at Rome:

"As late as 1825 new prisons were built for the Holy Office in lieu of those humanely destroyed by the French. These gloomy piles excite the wonder of the traveller who comes suddenly upon them after visiting St. Peter's and the Vatican close by. For this blood-stained prison is under the Pontifical roof. When the present Pontiff fled to Gaeta in 1849, the populace burst open the prison. No instruments of torture were found, for they were all destroyed by the army of the Republic. In one cell was a furnace, a woman's dress, and long tresses of hair pulled out by the roots. The furnace was of peculiar construction, and suggestive of horrible things, being large enough to contain a human body. The general impression of the people was that it had been used to consume the remains of victims. Near the luxurious apartment of the Primo Custode, a Dominican friar was found in a deep trap, a shaft opening into unknown depths. This was the vade in pace. As soon as the accused had confessed his offence, he was sent to the Commissary, the ouliette lying directly in his way. The words Go in peace were a signal to loose the catch, which at the least pressure opened a yawning tomb. The earth found at the bottom of this pit was chemically analyzed, and proved to be a compost of common earth.

At one time (1860) it was necessary to examine the prisons, as the foundations had become insecure from the constant overflow of the Tiber. The architect was not allowed to go alone, lest he should make plans, so two priests, one of whom was myself, and two guards escorted him. The most superstitious person could not tremble more than I did on entering those dread portals. The apartments of the jailers are commodious enough, and generally these are all that the visitor who obtains a special order from the Pope to inspect the Inquisition is allowed to see. Antonelli once remarked to these applications: 'Show your gold to the thief,' referring to the 'chief among you takin' notes,' of which the Vatican has a great horror. Dr. Maitland, author of 'The Church of the Catacombs,' had permission to take copies from inscriptions in the Lapidarian Gallery, but after two days it was revoked and Dr. Maitland had to surrender the papers he had about him on pain of search. But to return to the Inquisition. Leaving the custodian's department, we entered a vaulted corridor, very dirty, gloomy, and damp. It was a cul de sac, leading nowhere. The friar who accompanied us was more initiated, and opened what appeared a gargyle made of a hideous grinning fiend, probably some defunct inquisitor. It yielded to his key, and a small door opened leading to the door of the newly arrested. The cells were small, six feet by four, of stone grimed with age and dirt, horrible as the dens of wild beasts in the Colosseum. There was no window except a little grating high up in the wall about the size of an octavo volume, no outlet but the little, low door. Through this grating food and water were passed to the captive. The 'State of Prisons' records no worse dungeons. They are living sepulchres. In one of them a large number of skeletons, minus skulls, were discovered, buried in lime. This is supposed, with every probability in favor of the surmise, to have been the bath of quicklime. In it the sufferers were immersed up to the neck, and it was slowly increased until, with the suffocation of the smoke and the anguish of suppressed breathing, they died in unspeakable agonies. After a little time the heads would roll off into the hollows left by the shrinking of the lime. These were found collected in a hamper. The first tier of cells seemed to complete the prison, but our Charon pulled an iron ring in the stone floor, and revealed a small cavernous pit with an iron ladder to it. It looked like descending a coal shaft. We hesitated, lest the ladder should prove rotten; and truth to say, being so wholly in the hands of this friar, we were somehow apprehensive of treachery. The architect told me afterward that the same thought had occurred to him, and under its impulse he had noted every peculiarity of the way we had come, and was fully prepared to strangle the friar at the least approach of danger. We insisted with much politeness that he should descend first. We followed cautiously, and found ourselves in a low corridor which baffles description. Damp dripped from the slimy walls; vile reptiles and horrible vermin held carnival. Rats, emboldened by impunity, scampered about and stopped to stare at us. The cold that hot day penetrated the skin. As before, we could see no cells and no openings in the wall as above. The plashing of the river was audible. The friar pulled one of a line of rings inserted in the wall, and a small door opened. By introducing the legs first, we managed to get in. Imagine a cell level with the bed of the river,—a small grating looking upon it, but far above reach, a dimming light enough to reveal a foul den of torture. Could any human soul exist in such a place! The odor was horrible. Into these prisons the condemned were sent. At the least enlargement of the capricious river, the cell was filled with water and the prisoner drowned. The despairing cry for help and mercy died away unheard. Or worse than this, rats entered from the river and devoured the victim. No inquiry was made for them after imprisonment. The technical word in the records for these dungeons was Gehenna, sufficiently expressive. We breathed a secret prayer for the unhappy victims once confined there, recalling the prime maxim of the tribunal, 'as much punishment as can be inflicted without killing.' Truly they made hell felt in life."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"The platform upon which you stand is precisely my own, and has been for many years, namely, free. I do not care what a man believes, if he is only free. Of course, if he does not choose to be free, then he has a perfect right to be a slave, and no one has a right to find fault with his choice. In this age of the world, I am of the opinion, that the people are ripening into a desire for Freedom, unity in diversity. I feel to thank God, that there are bold spirits now who dare to advocate it. Ten years ago I was excluded from a Baptist church for heresy. Today, any church that has a creed can be found full of heretics, that is, if members would answer questions candidly; which goes to show that the world moves, and that you will in time have many more subscribers for your paper. They will be awfully hungry for such good things as you publish.

Now I want to ask one question, which please answer at any time, when convenient, in THE INDEX. What evidence have you that man is immortal? At the same time please state whether you have been able to find any evidence of it in this modern spiritual movement. I see that Dr. Adam Clark, in his commentary, Vol. I, on I Sam. ch. 28, drawing his conclusions from the Bible, was a strong believer in the possibility of communication between the two worlds. Henry Ward Beecher says it 'is a thing which we desire the most to know, and of which we know the least. I hope you will be able to give us some light on the subject.'"

"I wish to speak in time to secure one of the bound volumes of THE INDEX. I also wish to say that from the bottom of my heart I thank you for THE INDEX. Many times within the last two years, since I concluded to give up all efforts to be a Christian, have I wondered if I could be mistaken in the conclusions which my reflection on the subject of religion brought me to. Now I feel that I am not alone by any means, for I feel that my most radical thoughts are only the echo of other thoughts. It needs a brave and hopeful man to take the stand which you have taken, and that no discouragements may deter you is my earnest wish. I am much pleased with your manner of dealing with opponents. Sarcasm and ridicule are sometimes good, but certainly it requires much judgment to make either effective and not offensive; and as a general thing, I believe sound argument is better than either."

"Please 'chalk' my name for bound volume, complete for year. And were it not for business, pressing so closely, I would endeavor to increase your subscription list. But I assure you that I will do my utmost; and believe me, to read THE INDEX on Sunday is good as any dainty served for dinner."

"I see some would persuade you to enlarge your paper. Don't do it. Most of the larger ones are obliged to fill up with what is neither pleasing nor profitable. Yet if it has to grow—let it! But don't hurry it. I think it is large enough; and as it is, it is calling forth all the ire of the pious world."

LOCAL NOTICES.

The church of the FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY will be closed during the months of July and August. Services will be resumed on the first Sunday in September. Public notice will be given of any occasional service that may be held.

At the meeting of the RADICAL CLUB Sunday evening, July 3, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed by the RADICAL CLUB to draw up a petition addressed to the BOARD OF EDUCATION, requesting that the reading of the Bible, the singing of hymns, and public prayer, be henceforth discontinued in the public schools of this city; and that the committee be instructed to report at the next meeting of the Club."

The following persons were appointed by the CLUB to act as the above-mentioned committee: Mr. F. E. Abbot, Dr. T. M. Cook, Miss L. Peckham.

The report of this committee will be acted upon at the next meeting of the CLUB, Sunday evening, July 10, at 8 o'clock. The punctual attendance of all members of the CLUB is especially desired; and all persons interested in the object proposed in the above resolution are earnestly requested to attend.

The CLUB will be called upon to decide whether it is or is not advisable to circulate in the city such a petition as is here contemplated, to obtain signatures to it, and to present it to the BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Poetry.

THE PLANTING OF FRIENDSHIP.

Hope stole an acorn small from Paradise,
Which from her radiant smiles the sunshine drank;
And, like the cloud that feeds a flowery bank,
Fear rained fresh life from dew-distilling eyes.
Now under the broad chancel of its boughs
Her sacred altar fair Devotion rears,
Where Grief in worship rapt forgets her tears,
And Aspiration oft renews her vows.
Still let the branches burgeon more and more,
A living temple, towering to the skies;
Still let me list the whispered melodies
That through the leaves their murmurous music pour.
Curs'd be the axe its sacred blood would shed,
And with earth's mire pollute that sky-dividing head!

RE-ECHOES.

"Mr. Abbot is a born polemist, and one who turns against the Church that spirit and those weapons of persecution which the Church itself, in its less instructed periods, has not been ashamed to employ against the sheep without the fold, who should have been lovingly sought, but not hunted like wolves." So writes Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, in an editorial article which we last week reprinted entire from the Woman's Journal of June 11.

Later in the same article she says, referring to the Free Religious Association:—"They did show us that this effete system and superstition which in the present world so largely takes the place of true Christianity is an incumbrance to be undermined and removed, as strenuously as possible. They did show us that Christolatry, the worship of the person of Christ, and Bibliolatry, the worship of the Bible, are at the present day inimical to the pursuit of Christ's doctrine, etc." Would not a sincere orthodox believer, profoundly imbued (as thousands are) with faith in the orthodox views of Christ and the Bible, make precisely the same criticism on Mrs. Howe, after reading these words, which Mrs. Howe makes on us? Would he not say that Mrs. Howe, herself an iconoclast, condemns the iconoclast who goes beyond herself, and reprobrates in another, as the "spirit and weapons of persecution," the very spirit which she herself exhibits and the very weapons which she herself employs? Would he not say that the difference between us is only one of degree, and that she arbitrarily halts midway in a path which we have simply trodden to its end? We leave it to Mrs. Howe to draw the moral of this parallel.

It is not because we have felt even slightly annoyed by Mrs. Howe's criticism, that we now refer to it. On the contrary, we are always inclined to take sides with our critics against ourself. The sight of this inconsistency, however, which almost all Unitarians fall into, and which Mrs. Howe simply illustrates, has led us to conclusions against which even radicals like Mr. Wasson protest. It has made us pause and ask,—“how do we treat those who go farther still?” The love of freedom has caused us to reject “faith in Christ;” how do we treat those whom it has caused to reject “faith in God?” When they boldly give utterance to this rejection, shall we imitate Mrs. Howe, and stigmatize them as persecutors? Or shall we examine anew our own principle of freedom, and seek more earnestly than ever before to discover whither that principle truly leads? Is not the latter the better way? We believe it. And thus we have been taught to refrain from exhibiting that intolerance towards atheists, which Unitarians are too often tempted to exhibit towards “theists.”

But Mrs. Howe, like the majority of mankind, condemns what she does not understand. He who states convictions which are not hers seems to her to “insist on forcing his own views upon the world,” to be guilty of “acts of violence,” to illustrate the “instinct of the one man power,”—in short, to “perform the tyrant's part.” This vehement protest, this unguarded betrayal of a feeling heated almost to the temperature of a personal grievance, when the disagreeable but logical consequences of her own professed principles are pointed out to her, shows how incapable Christianity is, even in its most liberal forms, of favoring free thought and free speech. For Mrs. Howe is not only a Unitarian, but a so-called “radical” Unitarian,—in fact, the President of the Boston Radical Club. Yet the same free speech she herself uses with reference to Orthodox Christianity deeply offends her when used by another with reference to Christianity in general. In this respect she fairly illustrates the quantity and quality of the freedom allowed within the “Liberal Christian” denominations. It is because we are not satisfied with such freedom, that we have found it necessary to give up even Mrs. Howe's diluted Christianity. Outside these narrow limits, in the bracing atmosphere of the world of real life and unfettered thought, we meet men of all opinions, and never dream of feeling aggrieved if they both think and speak with earnestness against our own. They may believe more or less than we, and may even consider our faith in God and our hope of immortality as mere relics of superstition; but what of that? The liberty we demand, we have learned to give.

We cannot but hope that, as time goes on, Mrs. Howe may at last come to see the unutterable beneficence of the cause she now opposes, and no longer shrink from that necessary sacrifice of old beliefs and mistaken loyalties which it requires. She who wrote the Battle Hymn of the Republic,—the one lyric of the war which put the soul of the North into burning words,—has laid America under a debt which every true American rejoices to acknowledge, and which even she could not increase, unless, fired by the inspirations of a conflict vaster and grander still, she were to write the Battle Hymn of the coming Commonwealth of Man.

ALL ABOUT A WORD.

That sturdy friend of religious liberty, the Boston Investigator, has several times criticized THE INDEX for not altogether giving up the word religion, on the ground that our definition of its meaning is not the common one; and it endorses the criticism of others, that we fall into the same inconsistency, in accepting this word, that we object to when extreme radicals accept the name Christian. However widely we may differ from the Investigator on some very important subjects, we honor its manliness and thorough-going championship of freedom far too highly not to listen to its strictures with great respect. We will therefore briefly call attention to one or two points which we think the Investigator overlooks.

1. Is Buddhism a religion, or not? The scholars most competent to speak on the subject tell us that Buddha was an atheist, and that Buddhism is atheistic. Even allowing that only a portion, say one-half, of the Buddhists are atheists, we ask Mr. Seaver whether he denies that Buddhism may properly call itself a religion?

2. For one, we take facts as we find them. We find Buddhism, atheistic as it is, classed among the great religions of the world; and that, too, IN THE COMMON USE OF LANGUAGE. Religion, therefore, even in the popular mind, must be in some way consistent even with atheism; and we have defined it accordingly. It is only a narrow and, as it were, provincial use of the word which makes it necessarily imply belief in God. A larger acquaintance with the great religions of the world necessitates an abandonment of this provincial use of it.

3. It is not the word, but the thing, that we care for. Mr. Seaver mistakes, when he thinks we mean by Free Religion “simply Free Thought.” If we aim to make one thing clearer than another, it is that religion is deeper than mere “thought,” whether free or otherwise, and that it is rather the devotion of all our powers to the best and highest ends. This practical devotion of self to goodness, usefulness, and truth, is an effort after perfection—not merely a thought. Call it what you please, it is this that we believe in and work for; and when we call it religion, we do so because it seems to us the real fact which underlies historical religions in all their earnest and living forms. We care less than nothing about the word for its own sake.

4. If other people entertain different theories of this fact, that is no reason why we should give up our own theory, or abandon the name to what we regard as mere misconceptions of the thing. Because scientific men hold conflicting and imperfect theories concerning the nature of the sun, shall the scientific man who at last frames the true theory of its nature discard the word sun, and invent some new name for the world's great luminary? Of course not. Neither shall we give up the word which designates, after all, the great luminary of human life, simply because we think we have formed a truer theory of it than our neighbors.

5. We discard the word Christian, because we discard the thing it stands for,—faith in Christ. We retain the word religion, because we believe with all our soul in the thing which that word stands for,—the capacity and effort of man to develop into higher excellence than he has yet attained. What inconsistency is there in this? Why do we not “make as square work” as our friend of the Investigator?

If Mr. Seaver can prove either that Buddhism is not popularly known as a religion, or else that it is not atheistic, we shall be compelled to go over the whole ground of our reasoning afresh. And if we become convinced that his understanding of the word is correct, we will give it up without a regret. Prejudice, whether for or against a word, is utterly unworthy of a liberal mind.

FRIAR BACON.

WARREN, June 26, 1870.

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir.—In your essay of June 12, as published in THE INDEX of the 25th, the name of Friar Bacon is mentioned as one “hounded into his grave for daring to be wiser than his stupid cotemporaries.” Should it not be Roger Bacon, the great pioneer philosopher, whose works the monks rejected from their libraries, and imprisoned their author for ten years,—whose works and character are now appreciated in the nineteenth century, although they failed to be by his cotemporaries six hundred years ago?

Very respectfully,

MILTON SUTLIFFE.

[Our correspondent is correct in thinking our allusion applicable to Roger Bacon; but Roger Bacon was a Franciscan monk, and therefore receives commonly the appellation of “Friar.” By his knowledge of Mathematics, Chemistry, Physics, &c., he won the title of “the Wonderful Doctor” (Doctor Mirabilis); he made discoveries in optics and has been credited with the discovery of gunpowder, the properties of which he certainly knew, although ignorant of its application to fire-arms. Being accused of witchcraft on account of his knowledge, he was imprisoned by command of the general of his own order,—a fair sample of the rewards dealt out by the Church to scientific men. The principles of the “inductive method,” commonly supposed to have been first taught by Lord Bacon, were substantially anticipated by Friar Bacon more than three centuries earlier.—ED.]

IDEAL TYPES IN NATURE.

MR. ABBOT:—Believing in the relativity of all knowledge, and that what is called the knowledge of the sensible properties of the objects that surround us is a knowledge only of the changes in our states of consciousness, and not a knowledge of what the objects are in themselves, and believing that human intelligence cannot attain to knowledge of the nature or of the origin of things, I must deny (what is liable to be inferred from your article on “Human Ideals”) that the whole of the biological statements in that article are indisputable truths of science.

The facts of consciousness are the data of science; and the laws of science, though they represent but the impressions that external objects make on the human mind, answer our purpose, and we must reason on external things as if we saw them as they are. Therefore we may say, as you do, that it is an indisputable truth of science, and of common experience, that offspring, though they may slightly vary from the parent form, will inevitably belong to the parent species; that organic forces build up each new living structure in the strictest accordance with the typical form of the parent species; and that the nutrient matter, which supplies the material of increase, arranges itself with unerring precision so as to reproduce the ancestral form.

You then state, and it is this portion of your statements which I contend is not an indisputable truth of science, how it happens that organic forces build up new organizations, by affirming that, prior to the existence of every organic being, its idea or type exists in Nature, and moulds plastic matter in strict accordance with its own law, and presides like an invisible architect over the construction of the new edifice of life; and that the pre-existent idea or type, which you say determines the species of every developing organism, and acts irrespectively of its consciousness, presides alone in the formation of the human body as a member of the human species. All facts belong to science, and you make this statement not as a belief but as a fact. Can we be conscious of anything relating to this assumed fact? Has anything in external nature produced that state of consciousness in us to warrant the belief in an external object qualified to produce such a state?

You assume that the pre-existent ideas or types, which you say dominate the growth of every plant and animal from its germ, are distinct entities. You here enter on that great vital question which is exciting so strong an interest at the present time in the philosophical minds of Europe. It will be interesting to know what view you, as one of the representatives of liberal American thought, hold with regard to these entities. Do they belong to the ancient realm of “archetypal ideas”? Are they analogous to the Monads or Entelechies of Leibnitz? Are they any way related to the Hegelian “Idee,” or to the eternal, invisible, immutable, and sentient atoms of specific types, which Antoinette Brown Blackwell says constitute the life and mould the organization of every plant and animal? And with regard to your conception of germs. Do you adopt Bonnet’s theory of Emboulement? the theory of Preformation or Pre-existence of Germs, as held by Haller and Cuvier? or the theory which, until lately, was the prevailing one, namely, that of the Pre-existence of Cells? (the theory which supposed that all organized beings originate in a cell which contains potentially all the elements of the future being.)

The cell theory is being tacitly abandoned as untenable. Among those who openly repudiate it, are Professors Huxley and Owen. Huxley maintains that all organized beings are formed out of a universal living matter, or elementary life stuff, called Protoplasm. Owen says that all animals originate in a semi-fluid nitrogenous plasma. Something unknown to us, that can never be more than a matter of belief, does determine organic forms to resemble their parents. We may suppose this to be external living matter, susceptible of successive modifications from physical forms, and capable of transmitting, in the germ of its offspring, the living units which represent the parent form with its modifications, if any have occurred. The units use nutrient material, and multiply themselves, transmitting to each new unit the inherited formative tendency. The facts of science support the theory of modification, as it does that of the multiplication of physiological units; but we look in vain to science for the evidence of the “idea” or “type.” It is as rational, I think, to conceive that parental influences determine the form of offspring, as it is to conceive some invisible, intangible architect moulding, from an unknown distance, matter with which it has no visible connection.

JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

NEW HARMONY, Ind., Apr. 21, 1870.

[The above communication deserves a far better reply than we can give to it, though we have kept it too long already for the purpose of replying fully. It involves questions which cannot be discussed at all, except at considerable length.

We venture to refer Mr. Chappellsmith to a review of Herbert Spencer’s “Principles of Biology” which we published in the North American Review for October, 1868; and also to Mr. Spencer’s reply to the same, printed in pamphlet form by D. Appleton & Co. with the title—“Spontaneous Generation.” The language of the above communication shows familiarity with this work of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. Chappellsmith has not understood our meaning quite correctly,—which very likely may be our own fault. We add simply a few words of explanation.

1. If the parent-animal or plant itself embodies an idea or presents a definite type, then this idea or type exists before the offspring; and the development of the offspring is the reproduction of this pre-existent type in the new individual. That is, previous to the birth of an animal, the specific form it will assume can be exactly predicted from the study of the parent-form. The offspring of the horse, for instance, will be a horse,—never an elephant or a mosquito. If, then, the future form can be exactly predicted, is it deniable that the type or idea by which we predict already pre-exists? This is what we meant; and is it surely an “indisputable truth of science.”

2. But we are very far from regarding specific types as “entities,” or independent existences. In saying that the specific type exists anterior to the individual, we mean simply that the indwelling, creative Force of universal Nature is intelligent, and operates intelligently in realizing a definite structural plan. Growth is not accidental, nor is it a matter of uncertainty whether a robin’s egg shall hatch out a robin or a king-fisher. What we might call the robin-idea will determine the form of the young bird in all its development. Nothing but intelligence can explain this phenomenon of reproduction, the constant miracle of Nature.

3. Instead of postulating an infinite number of “entities,” or an invisible architect “moulding from an unknown distance” (we used no such terms as these), we believe that the “parental influences” postulated by Mr. Chappellsmith are nothing but the operation of the immanent and omnipresent Force working to a definite end. This is no more mysterious than the action of “parental influences;” but it is more philosophical, as implying unity instead of multiplicity of cause.—ED.]

THE HINDU LEGEND OF CHRISHNA.

ED. INDEX:—In No. 12 of your bold, dashing little paper, INQUIRER has given the legend of Chrishna, as found in the chapter on the gods of Greece, Italy, and India, by Sir William Jones, in his Asiatic Researches. He calls our attention to the marked similarity, in our Gospel narrations, of Jesus to the Hindu Chrishna. The parallelism itself raises the question: How came it? You say, you have met with no satisfactory theory of the causes of the parallelism. Here are a few thoughts which press themselves uppermost in my mind, in regard to it. I present them as a searcher after truth.

Suppose we should spell Christ with a K—thus, Krist? No Christian would see his god, savior, or redeemer in that word. It would be insulting to a Christian to spell his Christ with a K. Let us not, therefore, insult Sir William Jones, the scholar and Christian, by corrupting in the same manner his Hindu Chrishna, for we can see in this learned author’s orthography the very Christ. This is a parallelism to the eye.

Perhaps it will not be denied that Jesus of Nazareth did not inherit the name Christ, and that his parents did not give it to him. He then either assumed it, or his followers gave it to him; perhaps both. Let us read the eighteenth and nineteenth chapters of “The Acts,” and we shall learn that Paul preached not so much Jesus Christ, as that “Jesus was Christ,” or is the Christ. We shall learn, also, that Paul preached this fact to Christians, who perhaps had never heard of Jesus, and certainly who knew nothing of the Holy Ghost. For Apollos of Alexandria, an eloquent man, and well skilled in the Scriptures, who was instructed in the way of the Lord, that is, in Christianity, knew only the baptism of John; that is, knew nothing of Jesus, for being instructed “more fully” by Aquila and Priscilla, two of Paul’s converts to the doctrine that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, he (Apollos) then began to preach this fact, and mightily convinced the Jews that Jesus was the Christ. Here is a Christian of Alexandria, a teacher of the doctrine of Christianity, who perhaps never heard of the name of Jesus of Nazareth, till instructed by two of Paul’s converts. The conclusion seems to be irresistible that Christianity is older than Paul or Jesus.

But this is not all. Those Christians who knew nothing about Jesus, knew also nothing about the Holy Ghost, for Paul “finding certain disciples in Ephesus, he said unto them, have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, we have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.” There was existing, then, when Paul preached, a Christianity which knew neither Jesus of Nazareth, nor the Holy Ghost. To a Christianity without these he gave both.

It appears to me that the Synoptics are modified versions of the story of Chrishna, blended with a real life; and that Paul believed in the Indian legend of Chrishna, the “incarnate god,” the “good shepherd,” accompanied with the “divine spirit;” and also in the personal life of his fellow-countryman, Jesus of Nazareth, and preached the man Jesus as the incarnate Christ. What makes this still more plausible, is, that the doctrine of numerous re-incarnations of Chrishna was taught and believed. (See Sir William on this point.) Paul took it up as the last and most recent incarnation in the person of Jesus, his own countryman, and so preached Jesus as the Christ. What Christ? Surely not the Messiah “which was to come,” for Jesus was not of the lineage of David; but the very Christ who had come long before the appearance of Jesus of Nazareth, and who had been “preached to every creature which is under the heaven,” as Paul himself tells us,—who had long been the hero-god of a gospel which had “gone into all the world,” and the sound of which had “gone into all the earth,” long enough prior to the Christian era to have become established as the widely revered name of a religion before Paul preached or even Jesus lived.

It is quite well established that Chrishna is a name older than the New Testament Jesus. On this point Sir William Jones says:—“That the name of Chrishna, and the general outline of his story, were long anterior to the birth of our Savior, and probably to the time of Homer, we know very certainly.” He tells us further that the Sanscrit dictionary, compiled about two thousand years previous to 1784, contained the name of Chrishna, the “Shepherd God,” intermixed with epithets of the “Divine Spirit.” The Divine Spirit, or Holy Air, or Holy Ghost, has long been an object of worship among Eastern nations, who have had also some object to symbolize it in nature. The Persians in view of this held the dove sacred. The story of the dove descending upon Jesus after his baptism, is in point. Now picture Jesus with a dove fluttering about his head, with an aura of light adorning it, and we have the picture also of Chrishna. For Sir W. Jones also says, that “a large dark blue bird is consecrated to Chrishna and is often drawn hovering above his head.” For a Jew with Persian theology in his head, looking at such a picture of Chrishna, it would be very easy to make out a large dark blue bird to be no other than the sacred dove; and in reproducing it, he would paint it about the size of a rock pigeon. This renders the parallelism still more perfect; and the facts probably are, that the personal friends of Jesus, the obscure martyr, who had the courage to oppose the corrupt national religion of his countrymen, mixed in with his life the story of Chrishna. And Paul thus also incorporated into the existing Christianity the live body of Jesus.

The Jewish Messiah, also, like the Persian dove, became incidentally involved in the wedding of those old theologies.

Yours in search of truth,
JOEL MOODY.

Mound City, Ks., March 28, 1870.

[The above is substantially one of the theories to which we referred as not satisfactory to our own mind. There are several objections to it, a few of which we subjoin.

1. The word Krishna (this is the spelling adopted by more modern scholars than Sir William Jones) has no etymological connection whatever with the word Christ; and this fact renders the "parallelism to the eye," which Mr. Moody would retain, entirely misleading and deceptive. Krishna is an adjective signifying black; and it became the name of the eighth child of Devaki, because, according to the legend of the Puranas, he was born at midnight with a very black skin.

2. The title Christ arose naturally out of the Hebrew Messianic idea. It was an indigenous growth of Judæa, and contains no reference to Hindu legends.

3. The theory that Christianity, as such, existed before Jesus, will not bear examination. There is no evidence that a sect of "Christians" existed before his time. On the contrary, it is distinctly asserted (Acts, XI, 26) that "the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch."

4. Krishna-worship, in its developed form, is, according to M. Payie, "the most modern of all the philosophical and religious systems which have divided India into rival sects." If borrowing has taken place to any large extent (which we doubt), we incline to the belief that Krishnaism has borrowed from Christianity, rather than the reverse. But probably the resemblances are, in the main, coincidences.—ED.]

"COMPARISONS."

In the Woman's Journal, March 12th, we find an article by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, headed "Comparisons," in which she criticizes and condemns Mr. F. E. Abbot, for a comparison made by him between Socrates and Jesus. Admitting that comparison is one of the necessary laws of life, that it is only by comparing character with character that we fix upon a standard high enough to become a common one, she asks,—"Why, then, do people constantly wound us by jarring against each other two candidates for the public favor or reverence? Why do we dread nothing more than that the first person we meet shall shriek into our ears, with praises of his favorite, disparagement of our own?" As though we did not all make our own gods, and were not necessitated to protect or defend them by demolishing the gods of others! But is she not wounding the feelings of many that read the Journal, by her constant shrieking into their ears the "praises of her favorite," of that very Jesus who with his Church Fathers has bound, debased, and killed woman as woman, causing her to wear the everpresent chain of subjection and silence, to break which the indignant, high-spirited women of to-day are rising en masse? Though, as we read Christ himself baptised not, but his disciples, we may say Christ himself taught not, but his disciples, as we know nothing that Christ did teach save what his disciples chose to reveal. Yet he is made to lay the foundation stone of woman's degradation, to forge the chain of that slavery that binds her through the old story of Lot's wife, the justification of David's eating the Lord's shew-bread (Luke 17: 32), and his cruel reproof to Mary,—"Touch me not."

Was Christ ignorant that Lot was pulled out of Sodom by the strong arm of the Lord, that the Lord himself became the heavenly protector to escort Lot out of the wicked city, while his poor wife was not even permitted to lean upon the arm of her husband, but was obliged to plod along behind, unaided and uncared for? Surely she chose the better part in looking back, that she might become the memorial of shame, the "pillar of salt,"—though to women Christ never said, "ye are the salt of the earth." Was Christ, the redeemer of men, without sympathy for women, or was he ignorant of the reasons why David was justified in eating the Lord's shew-bread, (1 Samuel, 21: 5)? Surely he could not have said to his beloved Mary without a good and sufficient reason, (John 20: 17),—"Touch me not." That is, de file me not, lest my God cast me down to that region where Jude's angels are confined,—those sons of God that left their high estate and became "defiled among women." The one hundred and forty-four thousand "virgins" follow the Lamb wherever he goes; (Rev. 14: 4) they were not "defiled among women,"—that was the reason. Thus Christ is made to lay the foundation-stone of woman's degradation—to forge the links of the chain that now enslaves her, without which the Woman's Journal and The Revolution would have no mission. Upon this foundation-stone the husband sits lawfully enthroned, wearing the sovereign crown of Christ upon his head, and holding the scorpion whip in his hand. This chain is sometimes gilded with purest love, but is too often found rusty with brutal barbarity.

Without comparison, man might better die than live. He compares the good with the bad, the true with the false, the beautiful, which is a joy forever, with the deformed, which is no less an everlasting grief. Neither can command prevent it, nor request compel it. It is an action of the mind, sometimes dependent upon the will and sometimes independent of it, like the law of cause and effect. For the mind intuitively connects the realities and truths of the present with the imaginations and falsehoods of the past,—compares the present knowledge of facts with the past ignorance of belief, and decides according to the evidence.

The truth of the ancient proverb still remains. The mills of the gods, though grinding very slowly, will at last grind out the truth.

If Mrs. Howe was so aggrieved in spirit at the comparison made by Mr. Abbot between Socrates and Jesus, why did she, as an editor of the Woman's Journal, permit the declaration of two women impeaching the goodness and power of God to go forth to the world, on the first page of the same paper that condemned Mr. Abbot, without note or comment? Surely she might have condemned the spirit of the women, or she might have exonerated her Savior.

The first woman, speaking of the suffering and miserable, says,—“If God has the power to prevent such things and does not, he is unfeeling. If he lacks the power to prevent them, the universe might do as well without him. In either case, he does not command my respect.” The other says,—“I pity God, for he must see all this misery, and yet cannot help it without violating the laws of his divine order.”

Now what mind can escape the dilemma,—“either he cannot or he will not. In either case he does not command respect.”

We confess we could not resist “comparing” this and that, as thus presented to our mind. “Every woman is born with a stone on her head,” is a German proverb. As though this stone was not a religious stone! As though it was not the stone of foundation! Christ under God, man under Christ, woman under man! As though this stone was not placed upon her heart by virtue of her sex! As though it would not be necessary to roll the stone from off her heart, as well as from off her head, ere she can be educated or be fitted to vote! As though the great resurrection stone was not rolled back upon the hearts of those very women that said,—“Who shall roll for us the stone away?” by that simple command,—“Touch me not!” And by that servile mission—“Go tell my brethren, (not your brethren) that I am risen.” For my mission is not to you nor for you.

MARIA P. DINSMORE.

CURTIS ON INSPIRATION.

A logical thinker in the 25th number of THE INDEX, with the signature X, refers to this book as helping him to the first step in rational religion. The New Englander, in a notice of the same book, Oct. 1867, says: “The book is eminently adapted to the times,” “it cannot but be very useful”; “the interests of truth and of spiritual and supernatural Christianity are hindered more than is generally believed by the timid, superficial, and traditional treatment of this subject which is generally sanctioned and encouraged. There are other evils which deserve to be feared infinitely more than exposure to the suspicion of rationalistic tendencies.” (page 706.)

The North American Review, Jan. 1868, says of the book: “It is remarkable as a sign of the time rather than for new views or for exhaustive argument. Here is a candid, honest, and devoted teacher in an Evangelical sect who has come in the exercise of his work as a teacher, to reject utterly the prevalent idea of the Bible as literally inspired, or in any sense ‘infallible,’ and who finds no inspiration of any kind, either in the statements of the book or the souls of the writers, which guarantees their freedom from error. Thirty years ago the most liberal of the sects would have hesitated in approving such a volume. Now this view of inspiration finds general favor or is very gently condemned. It is not proposed to cast the author out of church, to deny him the Christian name, or to indict him for blasphemy. In substance, his view is not unlike that of Theodore Parker; yet his work will not be classed with the work of that arch-heretic.” (297). Why not? Why so great difference in the popular estimation of Parker and Curtis? One reason is that Parker announced his rationalism thirty years earlier than Curtis. Another reason is that Parker thought clearly, spoke strongly and consistently; and so prepared the way for Curtis, Bushnell, Beecher, Murray, Maurice, Stanley, Bp. Temple, and scores of others. Your correspondent X is doubtless right in regarding Supernatural Inspiration as the keystone of evangelical orthodoxy. Consequently the leaders of supernaturalism are in a difficult and perplexing position. If they hold fast to the dogma of Infallible Scripture, they upset the scientific, the learned, the thoughtful; if they give it up, they alarm the superficial and superstitious. Their predicament has some similarity with that of the slaveholders from 1830 to 1860, who had to decide between relinquishing their institution gradually, and holding on firmly and forever. If the gradualists had had their way, they might have carried their curse into the next century. And so, if the orthodox gradualists could but have their way, they might carry a mitigated, a milder and milder orthodoxy far down the stream of time. But it is not in human nature, least of all in orthodox human nature, to let gradualism move on unobstructed.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ OF INDIA.

Our attention has been called to an article in the Milwaukee Index on the Brahmo Reform in India, which, though written by some one who has been a resident in India, and who appears to be well informed in regard to the history of the Brahmo movement, is yet colored not a little by Christian prejudices, and is calculated to mislead the reader in some important particulars.

In summing up the principles of the Brahmo faith, the article says, “Intuition is the only guide to truth and duty. Intuition is their only revelation.” Now in distinction from an authoritative and infallible Book-revelation, the Brahmo Somaj lays great stress on the revelation of God in the soul through intuition. But it is hardly correct to say that “intuition is their only revelation.” A little book which comes forth from the Brahmo Somaj, and which sums up the history and views of the sect, says, “The Book of Nature and Intuition forms the basis of the Brahmo faith.” The laws of nature are put side by side with the intuitions of the soul. And Keshub Chunder Sen, in one of his published lectures, states the three methods of Divine revelation to be, “God in Nature,” “God in History,” and “God in the Soul.”

Again, the writer in the Milwaukee Index says, “Repentance has no place in their belief, as the mercy of God cannot interfere with his justice in regard to acts already committed.” The little Brahmo book above referred to says, “They believe that repentance is the only way to atonement and salvation.” But here, evidently, is some difference of understanding in regard to the meaning of repentance. The Brahmoes believe that it is that sincere sorrow for evil-doing which leads to amended purposes and conduct, and not that it takes away the punishment which has already been borne, of sin already committed,—suffering of some kind being the natural consequence of evil. Their critic holds, probably, the view of Orthodox Christianity with regard to repentance.

But a more serious charge which this critic brings against the Brahmo Somaj is that its members, or a large portion of them are addicted to worshipping their leader as a divine being, and that their leader, Keshub Chunder Sen, tacitly, if not expressly, permits the idolatrous homage. Now that some of the more recent and unenlightened members of the Brahmo Somaj, some among the multitude who are beginning to flock to its teachers for material and spiritual help, should be moved by the very gratitude of their hearts to bow in homage to him who seemed to them to be specially sent of God for their deliverance, would not be strange. The inhabitants of Lystra once thought Paul and Barnabas to be "gods come down in the likeness of men." And India has had its Avatars, its human incarnations of Deity, from time immemorial. It would be very natural if some of the native populace should regard the leader of this new religious reformation as a special incarnation of God, and transfer to him something of the feeling of trust and worship which they have just withdrawn from the idols of their old faith. There is reason to believe that some such tendency exists. But that it manifests itself at all to the extent which the writer of the article in the Milwaukee paper intimates, is wholly untrue. He makes the statement doubtless in good faith, but it is one of those misrepresentations and false charges which the struggling Brahmo Somaj has had to meet from Orthodox Christianity and Hinduism in India. That Keshub Chunder Sen should encourage any belief or practice which implies that he is more than mortal man, is not to be believed without other evidence than we have yet seen. His teachings, and those of the Brahmo Somaj generally, are utterly contrary to his making or allowing any such claim. In the very extract published in THE INDEX two weeks ago, taken from his lecture on "Great Men," he says,—"This idolatrous bending of the knee before man is an insult to Heaven, and an audacious violation of that entire loyalty and allegiance to God which is demanded of every true believer. Like every other form of idolatry, it is a treason against God, which pollutes the heart and degrades the soul." And the sentiments and spirit of all the Brahmo publications we have read, are wholly abhorrent to any such idolatry. Their one aim is to lead men away from reliance on human instruments and mediators to the Divine Being himself.

Yet suppose some individual members of the Brahmo Somaj should incline to render worship to their great representative and leader, they probably would retort upon their Christian critic, that it seemed to them no worse to worship a living man as an incarnation and revealer of Deity than to worship one who has been dead more than eighteen centuries.

The Milwaukee writer bears good testimony to the reforms accomplished by the Brahmo Somaj. He says, "They have renounced idolatry and polytheism, abolished caste, polygamy, and infant marriages; uphold Theism, female education, the appearance of women in society, and purity of life."

A "RADICAL CLUB" IN INDIA.

Among the reformers in Calcutta there is a society called the "Family Literary Club." We give below a printed report which has come to us, of one of its recent meetings.

The sixth ordinary meeting of the above Club was held on the 25th February, 1870, at 8½ P. M., on which occasion a lecture was delivered on the "Rise and Progress of the Brahmo Somaj Movement in India," by Babu Gosto Behary Mullic.

The lecturer opened by remarking that in a country like Hindustan, inhabited by the most fruitful, the most intellectual, and the most religious section of the Aryan race, the modern progress of religious thought, necessitating the renunciation of the dull, cold, ceremonial creeds and traditional errors of an ancient date, is an event fraught with the most cheering consequences, and affords ample food for the contemplation of the philosopher, the theologian, and the philanthropist. He took a rapid glance at the noble advance towards Truth man was everywhere making; and shewed that in Europe, Asia, and America, the time honored systems of error and imposture were sinking beneath their own rottenness. Enlightened Christendom, he believed, looked upon popular Christianity as an obsolete superstition soon to be burnt upon the pyre on which the creeds of the Brahmin, the Buddhist, and the Moslem are already perishing. Speaking of Asiatic progress, he referred to a new system of religion, named "Babism," which has done much good by abolishing polygamy, and raising the status of women. The lecturer then proceeded to take a cursory view of the past history of the Brahmo-Somaj movement, and traced the successive developments of religious thought it had undergone since the days of Ram Mohun Roy. He gave a vivid description of the state of the Hindu orthodoxy, when Brahmoism came into existence. He then noticed at some length the main features of the controversy which commenced nearly nine years ago between the Brahmo Somaj and the Christian missionaries, and was glad to find that it had resulted in so complete a ruin to the cause of evangelization.

The lecturer then proceeded to discuss the question of secession in the Brahmo Somaj, and declared his sympathy to be entirely with the progressive party. He compared it with the disruption of the General Assembly of Scotland which took place in 1843, and hoped that the labors of the progressive friends would be crowned with the same success which had attended the noble efforts of the Free Church of Scotland. Having briefly noticed the charge of man-worship laid against certain Brahmos, he dwelt at length on the magnificent opportunity this age and country present for the extension of the Brahmo faith. He noticed, with evident feelings of deep sorrow, the unbrotherly and bitter feelings of animosity which had been exhibited by certain conservative and progressive Brahmos, and earnestly hoped that they should evince a more forgiving spirit towards each other; for charity was one of the foremost virtues required of those who professed themselves as worshippers of One True God. He concluded by exhorting his Brahmo friends to form a widely extended theistic union throughout India in the following earnest and eloquent language:—

"FRIENDS AND BRETHREN,—Though the power of truth may be on your side, let me impress upon you the great fact that union in all matters, whether religious or political, is one of the mightiest sources of strength, so much so, that even the effete institutions of ages have, through its instrumentality, become well nigh eternal. A German poet has truly said—

Divide the thunder into single notes,
And it becomes a lullaby for children;
But pour it forth in one quick peal,
And the royal sound shakes the heavens.

How much, then, it behooves us to unite in our efforts to cleanse and purify our ancient creeds and systems, which, like aged trees, have struck deep their vile roots, and closer cling on the bigot's warped mind! While remembering our individual responsibility, let us so combine our efforts as to make the supporters of ancient superstitions feel that the sun of their power is well-nigh set. Let us not waste our endeavors by throwing them, without a settled plan, where chance or caprice may direct. Let the theists of the Punjab and the North-West of Bombay and Madras, shake hands with their brethren in Bengal in fraternal sympathy and active co-operation, and let them mutually lend a helping hand in each other's labors. Nay, let not our brethren from bleak Albion's shores, as well as from the—

Great clime, that in free and full defiance,
Rears its crest unconquered and sublime,

withhold from them their words of hearty sympathy and lofty cheer. Isolated efforts, I am convinced, will never bring about that amount of success, which from our very hearts we like to see consummated. I beseech, then, all reflecting theists calmly to reflect how long would be delayed the doom of the man-made creeds, if they are to aim at them their desultory shots. Let them not, through want of brotherly love and union, leave the noble work of man's spiritual emancipation to a later age; but let them unitedly herald the advent of absolute religion, and establish it forever. Let them, in regard to the duties of the day, and the prospects of the future, support and strengthen each other in the common work which they have in hand. If they so co-operate with each other, whatever difficulties may lie in their way will soon be surmounted, and future generations will, perhaps, congratulate us for having rescued them from the destructive as well as the 'constructant' work in religion. The fruits of such a union will then be exhibited in the thorough absence of superstition or fanaticism, in the augmented brotherly love, religious unity, and sympathy, and an unprecedented spiritual welfare of the now dismembered elements of the human race. Our brethren then may rest assured that—

The time shall come when from their heights serene,
Beyond the grave, they'll look back, and smile
To see the plains of earth all growing green;
Where science, art, and love repeat heaven's style,
And with God's beauty fill the desert Isle,
Till Eden blooms where martyr fires have burned,
And to the Lord of Life all hearts and minds are turned."

The Vice-Chairman, Babu Ashoo Toss Dhur, L. C., then complimented the lecturer on the eloquent manner in which the subject had been treated. Having noticed at some length the several points discussed in the lecture, he conveyed the thanks of the meeting to him, after which the members and visitors retired.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

NOTES AND BEAMS.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., Jan. 26, 1868.]

"Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?"
MATT. 7: 3.

Perhaps the most difficult of all attainments is self-knowledge. Tangled and twisted almost beyond the possibility of unravelling is the mass of motives out of which our actions are spun: Human life is often compared to a river; and it is scarcely more difficult to tell from what brook in the meadows, or what spring on the hill-sides, the drops come that make up the gliding stream, than it is to tell from what source arise the various deeds that make up the current of our outward life.

In this bewildering complexity of motives, the chances for self-deception and self-flattery are very great. Vanity steps in, and puts conscience to sleep with her powerful narcotics; she whispers that what we have done was prompted by this or that good impulse instead of this or that bad one, and we lend a willing ear to her pleasing cajolery. We are always inclined to put the best possible construction on our own doings, and seldom lack excuse in our own eyes for what, if seen in others, we should instantly condemn. "The looker-on," it is said, "sees most of the game;" and self-love, perverting our vision, makes us often comprehend our own actions far less truly than cool and observant spectators. The good that we do we magnify; the evil that we do we extenuate. If we wish to better the character of our own doings, we must learn to scan them as sharply as if they were not our own,—learn to give no quarter to our own faults, but rather, in that warfare, hoist the black flag. There will be little danger of undue severity in dealing with ourselves; the danger is all the other way. The rule cannot be too strict or high by which we are to judge our own actions and motives; and in these we shall find abundant occasion for virtuous indignation. The hardest lessons life has to teach are, first how to see, and next how to extract, the beam in our own eye.

The extreme difficulty, however, of perceiving our own faults, is paralleled by the extreme facility of perceiving other people's faults. It is as easy to see a mote in their eyes, as it is hard to see a beam in our eyes. In fact, it is so very easy to see motives in others, that, if no motives exist, we are very apt to imagine them. Nine-tenths of the harsh judgments I hear are, in my opinion, more or less unjust. A grain of suspicion, a grain of jealousy, ten grains of conceit, and an hundred grains of self-ignorance,—that makes an infallible recipe for censoriousness. A man commonly gets full credit for all his vices, and a little more. Living, as we all do, under the microscope, through which the public is looking with its countless eyes, our imperfections are magnified, and often multiplied. Nothing is easier than to put a severe construction on what we see done; and frequently nothing is more unjust. There are many persons who fancy it argues great penetration, profound knowledge of human nature, to attribute a low or mean motive to the actions of others; but believe me, friends, there is deeper knowledge of human nature in admiration than in censure. We all censure too much,—who too much admires? In any case where a good and bad motive seem equally possible, he shows not only a nobler character in himself, but also a profounder insight into the human heart, who gives goodness the benefit of the doubt.

Even in the actions of men which look the worst, and are the worst, it is seldom that evil exists unmixed. The previous struggle against temptation, the remorseful feeling that accompanies surrender, the tornado of self-reproach that follows it, the half-despairing resolve to conquer hereafter, the still-born prayer that somehow could not draw a living breath,—all this may be as real as the deed itself; yet to human inspection it appears not, and the condemnation of man may be severer than that of Heaven. Poor Robert Burns, himself a victim of impulse, circumstance, and habit, well knew the meaning of the words, when he wrote,—

"What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted."

The beam we think we see so clearly in another may be only a mote,—the mote we think we see may be only the fiction of our own fancy; and while I would urge a rigorous severity in weighing our own faults, I would urge at the same time a generous leniency in weighing the faults of others. These two I commonly find conjoined. The man who strictly calls himself to account is quick to make allowance for others; while he who is over-harsh with others, is usually over-indulgent with himself. The eye with the biggest beam spies out the tiniest mote.

Censoriousness is always the proof of a little soul. He who forever blames is the poorest of all company; while he who, in this world doubtless so full of wrong, sees the beautiful aspects of character and can find leisure to utter a word of admiration, makes every one he meets a debtor. How sweet a thing it is to encounter unaffected charity! What a glow it creates in the heart,—what a stimulus to generous sentiments! I feel refreshed by every one who sees with joy the noble in his fellow-men, and grieves to see in them the ignoble. Far be it from me to praise credulity, or to counsel you to let yourselves be gullied by mere appearance. Hypocrisy merits the severest and heaviest verdict. But I hold him to be the gull, the dupe, who is cheated by his own inward rottenness into taking all seeming goodness for hypocrisy. Pretension is no more real than that which it pretends; the very fact that rascality must ape honesty in order to succeed, is an involuntary admission that honesty itself is no humbug. Hence Rochefoucauld says, with all the inspiration of a true poet,—"Hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue." Nobody can discriminate rectitude from its sham, but he who believes in both; and he who believes in both, piercing as may be his insight into the false, cannot withhold his reverence from the true. By charity, therefore, I do not mean gullibility, stupid blindness to hypocritical pretence,—still less a mawkish and gushing sentimentality; but I do mean that large generosity of judgment which refuses to condemn on mere suspicion,—that deeper and diviner wisdom which, even in acknowledged wrong, can make allowance for and pity, the wrong-doer. Charity believes that every man is better than his deeds, and is anxious to discover the palliations which Omniscience, at least, discerns; it discriminates between the sinner and his sin, and to hatred of the sin adds compassion and love for the sinner; it forbears to denounce persons even while forced to denounce actions; it wounds only to heal, and, to avoid injustice, is willing to be sneered at itself. Censoriousness is a mixture of vanity, cruelty and presumption; charity is the union of a wisdom which sees beneath the surface, a love which embraces all mankind, and a modesty which is faith in universal goodness. The censorious man indirectly praises himself by condemning his neighbor; the charitable man praises humanity by admiring the goodness that cannot wholly die even in the worst of men.

Where shall we find an instance of charity so surpassingly beautiful and touching as in the story of Jesus and the sinful woman? The fourth gospel, in which this story occurs, is regarded by many of the best modern scholars as the latest and least authentic record of his life contained in the new Testament; and all modern scholars of high reputation admit that the first eleven verses of the eighth chapter, in which this story is told, have no right to be regarded as part even of this fourth gospel, not being contained in any of the best manuscripts. Yet if any story whatever about that beautiful character and life attests itself as true by intrinsic marks, this story surely so attests itself. Although preserved in merely a legendary form, and added to the fourth gospel at a comparatively late date, I cannot believe that it is not substantially true as a matter of biography. But even if not historically true, its spiritual truth is none the less commanding. Only a soul as great as the soul of Jesus could so act and speak; and I believe that none of his acts or words have done more than these to win the love and reverence of humanity. Picture to yourselves the scene so simply yet so movingly described, and, with me, see in it an illustration of that spirit of divinest charity which is surely the spirit of God.

A poor stained woman, condemned to death by the stern law of Moses, is brought in mockery by the Scribes and Pharisees to the young country Rabbi, teaching the eager crowds in the magnificent temple of the Hebrew worship. Her fate is pre-determined in their minds; they desire only to entangle the man they fear and hate in the snare they have cunningly laid for him. What care they for the wretched creature in her agony of shame and terror? All they seek is to entrap the young heretic in some answer that will turn from him the hearts of the people. So, with pretended deference for his opinion, they tell him of the law of Moses that decrees her cruel death, and add,—"But what sayest thou?"

To hide, perhaps, the blush of mingled delicacy and indignation at their hypocritical appeal, the youthful teacher stoops and writes with his finger on the sand. With eager malignancy they press the question, while the people wait curiously for his reply. Slowly he rises from his stooping posture, and slowly, with a glance that pierces even those rocky hearts, he utters the memorable words,—"HE THAT IS WITHOUT SIN AMONG YOU, LET HIM CAST THE FIRST STONE AT HER!" And again he stoops to write upon the ground. He that is sinless in that horde of murderers! He that is sinless in that crowd of sinful men, who, with souls full of slaughter, would fain add to the blood of their guilty victim the blood of the guiltless also! He that is sinless—sinless! None but the sinless to cast the first stone at the sinful! Ah, how that word tears off the disguise from their own hearts, and startles them with the sight of their own moral hideousness! In vain they strive to conquer their horror of themselves; even they are scourged beyond endurance with the scorpion whip of conscience; and stealthily, while Jesus still is stooping, they slink off one by one, with that word sinless echoing and re-echoing through their souls. None but the sinless man must hurl the first stone at that poor drooping head; and he—will not!

Their footfalls die away. Silence reigns through the stately courts of the temple. The stricken culprit and her deliverer are alone. Again the stooping form arises; and, in the bowed and broken-hearted woman at his feet, Jesus reads at one glance the whole sad history of temptation, sin, and shame,—the whole unspoken and immortal promise of that agony of contrite woe. With what unutterable compassion for her blasted peace, with what divine tenderness for her tortured and bleeding spirit, with what grand faith in the holier future that even yet awaits her, does he behold that crouching figure? Gently he asks,—“Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee?” And (surely it is with sobs) she falters forth,—“No man, Lord,”—while she waits, crushed to the very earth, her sentence from his lips. Ah friends, what a sentence it is! Remember who it is that speaks, and who that hears. If ever a pure spirit dwelt in a human body, it was the spirit of Jesus; if ever a spirit had been contaminated by desecration of its earthly temple, it was the spirit of that poor, contrite woman. Purity itself stood face to face with humanity in its deepest degradation; and hearken to its word. “Neither do I condemn thee—neither do I condemn thee; GO, AND SIN NO MORE.” None but the sinless shall cast the first stone—and this is the stone he casts! None but the guiltless shall condemn the guilty—and this is the condemnation!

In this divine utterance of the spirit of Jesus,—as sinless, surely, as human spirit ever was, though none is absolutely pure,—I cannot but hear the Universal Justice passing sentence on repentant sin itself,—the sentence of full, free, tenderest forgiveness, without condition or qualification. The terrible consequences of sin must still work themselves out, according to the unchangeable law of cause and effect; but hope and faith and divine encouragement remain, to stimulate the soul to complete self-mastery. If this is the charity of God, what shall be the charity of man? Where the All-Perfect pours out its pity and pardon, shall the Imperfect censure and condemn? Hush forever the harsh discords of condemnation, and let the soft music of compassion make melodious our human speech. Let charity throw her veil over human frailty, and leave unspoken the cruel, censorious word. Let society, with its bitter injustice to fallen woman, learn to practise the high ethics of love. In the person of that poor, crushed, and weeping outcast, hiding her head in agony of contrition and shame, behold the type of all human transgression; and in the words of Jesus, full of reverence for the human soul, however soiled, hear the sentence passed upon it by the Infinite Purity above,—“NEITHER DO I CONDEMN THEE; GO, AND SIN NO MORE.”

Miscellaneous.

HIGH OLD EPISCOPACY.

[From the Cleveland Daily Herald.]

There are degrees in High Churchism, as there are varying altitudes in church steeples. High differs from High and Dry, and there are differences in height in each class, though a general resemblance among them all. The class of churchmen represented by the Episcopal Council of the Diocese of Wisconsin go a notch beyond all previously recognized classifications, and must be ranked as High Old Church. Their Episcopal backs hump more than a camel's or that of an infuriated cat. They have shinned to such a height up the ecclesiastical pole as to have lost their heads entirely, and there is danger of their falling and breaking their clerical necks.

The telegraph informs us that the Episcopal Council of the Diocese of Wisconsin have solemnly issued a decree on marriage. Episcopalians must marry Episcopalians or be excommunicated. They must be married by an Episcopalian priest or be debarred the rites of the church. There is no need of bell, book and candle. The commission of the act carries with it excommunication. And as this class of churchmen hold that there is no orthodoxy but their doxy, that the one true church is their church, and that there is mighty poor chance for salvation beyond its pale, it follows that an Episcopalian marrying a Presbyterian, or calling in the aid of a Justice of the Peace, according to the laws of the country, is condemned to “perish everlastingly.”

These are “hard lines” for Episcopalian young men and women. When an Episcopalian swain in Wisconsin woos a damsel who goes to Presbyterian strawberry festivals or Methodist tea-drinkings, he must pop the question with an additional clause—“Will you have me and become an Episcopalian?” or rather, “Will you become an Episcopalian and take me?” The maiden who carries a prayer-book emblazoned on the cover with a cross, before she receives the attentions of an eligible young man, must inquire whether he is a communicant at St. Malachi's and whether, should an engagement result from their acquaintance, he is willing that the rector of St. Agatha should tie the knot and bestow the nuptial benediction.

The Episcopal Council of Wisconsin—with all due respect to the cloth be it said—have made high old donkeys of themselves, if the report of the adoption of such a resolution is true. We should advise them to go to Rome, kiss the Pope's toe, and shout for Infallibility forthwith, but for the reflection that the Holy Father would probably snub them for their excess of zeal. In the decree just issued they have out-Heroded Herod and proved themselves more intolerant than the Roman church itself. Mixed marriages are discountenanced by the Roman Catholic church, but they are not absolutely prohibited. They do not work excommunication. The member of the communion who marries out of it is held to have done an unwise act, unless there is a probability of speedily bringing the outsider within the pale, but there is no denying of the sacraments to the erring one. We have known such mixed marriages even to be encouraged when there was a strong probability of thus making converts. It was left for the Protestant Episcopal authorities in Wisconsin, to knock down the persimmons of intolerance with a longer pole than even Rome itself handles.

Bishop Kemper is dead. Bishop Armitage rules in his stead. We do not know what has been the previous standing of Bishop Armitage on the clothes and candle question, but the action of the Council of his Diocese would seem to stamp him as one of the highest of the High Old Church party.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND MARRIAGE.

[From the Toledo Commercial.]

A despatch sent from Chicago on Friday night last reads as follows: “The Episcopal Council of the Diocese of Wisconsin, held at Milwaukee yesterday, adopted the following new canon: ‘Every communicant of the church marrying outside of our communion, or married by any other than a clergyman of our church, shall stand pro facto excommunicated.’”

This despatch has drawn from the press considerable comment, and given an opportunity to those who desire it to remark upon the “Romanizing tendency” of the Episcopal Church. In the absence of any official report from the Episcopal Convention of the Diocese of Wisconsin, we cannot, of course, speak positively concerning the character of the despatch; but from the structure of Episcopal Conventions and the general sentiment of the Church, we judge it to be false. An Episcopalian would doubtless condemn it at once upon what is called “internal evidence,” its absurdity being patent.

In the first place, the general sentiment of the Episcopal Church is averse to any such rule, the Church standing in respect to marriage upon precisely the same ground with other Protestant churches,—that is, the Church holds marriage to be a divine ordinance, but not a sacrament, and does not claim any more control of marriage than is claimed by other Protestant churches. The Church admits, or rather the sentiment of the membership admits—for there is no Church law on the subject—that marriages solemnized by civil officers or by clergymen of other churches, are sacred and valid. In the matter of marriage, the Episcopal Church is, as it is upon so many other doctrines of the Romish Church, a Protestant Church, for in its Articles it protests against the dogma that marriage is a sacrament, and especially against the celibacy of the priesthood. This being the position of the Church and the sentiment of its membership, it is absurd to suppose that a Diocesan Convention would adopt any such rule as the despatch announces. So far as its adoption, in case it were adopted, should rest upon the “cloth” or the clergy, as ill-posted journals intimate, this is still more absurd, for Episcopal Conventions are composed of the Rector and three laymen from each parish, the latter being chosen either by the Vestry or the parish at large, thus giving the laity a three-fourths vote in the Convention. It is hardly probable that the laity of Wisconsin are prepared to take the ground indicated.

It is difficult to conceive how the despatch originated, unless the subject was brought before the Convention. It was probably under consideration in some shape, and it is not improbable that a resolution recommending marriages within the church and by Episcopal clergymen was adopted. It is possible also that, as a test of the sentiment of the church on the subject, some such canon was recommended to the consideration of the next General Convention.

P. S.—Since the above was in type, we have met the following statement, addressed to the Detroit Tribune, which explains the “mare's nest” that has excited so much stir:—

It so happened that I was present at the Convention of the Diocese of Wisconsin, on Wednesday last, when a young man introduced the above mentioned canon, and he stated that he did so upon his own responsibility, and without expecting its favorable consideration. It was received with much merriment, and without one word of favor from any one but the person who offered it. As a matter of simple courtesy to the mover, it was, at his own request, referred to the Committee on Canons. The Committee, without leaving their seats, reported in words of pleasantry against it, and the proposed canon was rejected without one vote in its favor except that one of its author. The whole subject was out of the way in as little time as it takes to pen this contradiction.

H. P. B.

Rev. H. W. Spalding, Rector of Grace Church,

Madison, Wis., says to the Chicago Tribune, “The statement is unmitigated falsehood. I respectfully call upon you to publish its retraction at your earliest convenience. No such canon was adopted.”

THE A. U. A. INDICTED.

[The following editorial and the subjoined squibs are from the Christian Register.]

Grave charges have often been brought against this Association by anonymous writers in some of our journals, but now several serious allegations are made by a responsible person. In the Liberal Christian, Mr. Hepworth states that “We can sit in our easy chairs and read a sermon delivered by one in full fellowship with the body and in the pay of our officers, in which Christ is made the subject of flippant remark, and not a twinge disturbs us.” The best interests of the denomination require that the officers of the American Unitarian Association should plead guilty or not guilty to this charge.

In the Religious Magazine also, Mr. Hepworth states that our differences of opinion “go to the utmost limits of Theism, which laughs at the rite of baptism, scoffs at the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, speaks of the blood of Christ and the blood of Cock Robin in the same breath, and tells us we have already had too much of Jesus Christ, and that he should be laid to rest.” Alluding to persons who hold these opinions, Mr. Hepworth adds, “The American Unitarian Association will not long command the confidence of the majority of our laymen and ministers, if they send such men out from Sunday to Sunday to preach the word.” Gentlemen of the Executive Committee, this clearly implies that you are in the habit of employing men who preach about the blood of Christ and the blood of Cock Robin in the same breath, and say that we have already had too much of Jesus Christ, and that he should be laid at rest. If you value your continued influence with our churches, you must not be silent when such charges are made by so prominent an accuser who has just retired from your Board, and is acquainted with your action.

The London Inquirer is much pleased with the action of the American Unitarian Association with reference to the proposed creed. It says: “We heartily congratulate our kindred Association in America on having thus maintained a fundamental principle which is far more important than the bond of a common doctrinal faith.” After Mr. Hepworth has secured a creed for Dr. Dewey, Dr. Walker, Dr. Hedge, Dr. Bellows, Dr. Clarke and Prof. Everett, as THE INDEX predicts, perhaps he can be induced to go over to England and save Mr. Martineau, Mr. Gaskell and Sir John Bowring from “going under” by assisting in the preparation of a “Statement of Faith” for them. Two such broad missionary fields will challenge his energies for some time to come.

In enumerating the disastrous changes which have come over the Unitarian body in the last twenty years, Mr. Hepworth says there is “little desire on the part of ministers to work together.” It must have required even all his courage to make this statement in full view of the National Conference, Local Conferences, and five-fold contributions to the treasury of the American Unitarian Association.

The pastor of the Church of the Messiah, New York, says: “If the Lord acts up to his promise to deny in heaven those who deny him on the earth, we can easily predict that the Unitarian denomination has not a very hopeful future.” It seems to us a great confusion of ideas to regard the refusal of the denomination to grant Mr. Hepworth a creed for a “campaign document” as a denial of the Lord Jesus.

Rev. F. E. Abbot, in THE INDEX, applauds Mr. Hepworth's courage and consistency, seems to wish him to go on with his creed-project, and even predicts his success! We have always supposed that Mr. Hepworth's course would be exceedingly gratifying to Mr. Abbot and THE INDEX, and it turns out that we were right in our conjecture.

Mr. Sears infers that Mr. Hepworth means to bring his creed-project before the National Conference next fall. Is it with the least hope of converting the denomination, or only “to spend so much of the day in discussion that no hour is left to talk of work?”

The pastor of the Church of the Messiah, in New York, says that “from the Hudson river to the Mississippi our churches can be almost counted on the fingers of two hands.” Will somebody be so kind as to send Mr. Hepworth a Year Book?

[The above shows plainly enough how the heaven is working among the Unitarians. Until a “Statement of Faith” is adopted and enforced as a rigid test of ministerial qualifications, the Executive Committee of the A. U. A. will be obliged to act as Mr. Hepworth states. The Register fights the proposed creed in public, but wants the Committee to act upon it in secret; to make a pretence of freedom to the world, but to proscribe preachers for their opinions in its private business sessions. But the world sees through this little game, and thoroughly despises it. The Register squirms and winces under Mr. Hepworth's lash; and all its venomous little digs and side-thrusts will not shield its own back. The Unitarians have got either too much or too little of a creed; and Mr. Hepworth, knowing his own power, seems disposed to use it vigorously.—Ed.]

DECLINING AN OFFER OF MARRIAGE.

[From the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.]

Our brethren of the Methodist Church, North, must begin by this time to be greatly exercised over the hardness of heart in the South, which continues to turn a cold shoulder to their insinuating overtures for reconciliation and re-union. It will be remembered that at our late Conference in Baltimore these Northmen did a wooing go, but were not successful, although, as ladies under such circumstances inform rejected lovers, we assured them that, though we could not accept their hand, we should always hold them in high esteem as friends, a compliment which, we fear, some of them did not appreciate. This rebuff, however, seems not to have been considered as conclusive, for at the late General Conference, in Memphis, the persistent suitor appeared once more, got up in a style quite regardless of expense, and seemed bent upon enclosing us in his yearning embrace. But, as our readers have already heard, we felt compelled, with tears in our eyes, once more to utter the monosyllable, "No." We have uttered that word almost as often as Victor Hugo reiterates it in his late fulmination at the Plebiscitum. Our indefatigable gallant is like that spasmodic Frenchman, always compelling us to say "No! No!! No!!!" and almost like him to declare that there is only one question which the Napoleon (of Northern Methodism) can ask, to which we can return an affirmative answer, to wit: "Shall I go before the courts and be tried for highway robbery, sacrilege, murder and usurpation?" Yes.

Far be it from us to fail to appreciate, even if we cannot reciprocate, the repeated propositions for sacred wedlock. We have no doubt that the intentions of our respected suitor are honorable. We have known him too long to suppose that he would consent to betray trusting confidence! We feel excessively flattered by his attentions. We are tempted to look in our mirror a dozen times a day, to see what it is that so arouses his admiration. Sometimes we think that the fascinating rogue has been captivated by our money. But then, alas, we remember that we have lost our fortune. Some years ago we had a splendid inheritance, but it has all gone. The heiress woke up one fine morning to find herself beggared. A band of burglars had broken into the paternal mansion. The villains had carried off silver plate, diamonds, bank notes, all that we possessed, murdered nearly half the inmates of the house, and then set fire to the dwelling. Who could these atrocious criminals have been? Perhaps our importunate swain can tell us! Perhaps, if he is gifted with detective skill, he can help to recover the property! And then, who knows but he may yet obtain the coveted damsel? In the meantime, we have some information, which perhaps may assist him in his investigations. An old porter of the house has always declared that he saw distinctly the rogues who first entered the dwelling, and that they were disguised as Northern Methodist Ministers!!!

We fully appreciate the just and merciful instincts of our Northern friends, but their ideas of justice and mercy, as expounded by Dr. Eddy, of Baltimore, including confiscation, might make their embrace that of a Polar bear rather than of a tender bridegroom. We concede that they are great philanthropists, as much bigger and better than we as the huge philanthropist, Mr. Honey-thunder, described by Dickens in "Edwin Drood," whose "philanthropy was of the gunpowderous sort that the difference between it and animosity was hard to determine," and who sought to have universal concord by eliminating all the people who wouldn't, or conscientiously couldn't, be concordant. "You were to love your brother as yourself, but after an indefinite interval of maligning him (very much as if you hated him,) and calling him all manner of names." The picture Boz gives of this Mr. Honey-thunder travelling into Cloisterham, reminds us so forcibly of our Mr. Honey-thunder, that we must be excused for transcribing it, premising that the philanthropist, who was a very large man, was seated on the box of the vehicle, with the driver, having his elbows squared and his hands on his knees, compressing the driver into a most uncomfortably small compass, and glowering about him with a strongly marked face.

"Is this Cloisterham?" demanded Mr. Honey-thunder, in a tremendous voice.

"It is," replied the driver, rubbing himself as if he ached, after throwing the reins to the hostler. "And I never was so glad to see it."

"Tell your master to make his box-seat wider then," returned the passenger. "Your master is morally bound, and ought to be legally, under ruinous penalties, to provide for the comfort of his fellow-man."

The driver instituted, with the palms of his hands, a superficial examination of his skeleton; which seemed to make him anxious.

"Have I sat upon you?" asked the passenger.

"You have," said the driver, as if he didn't like it much.

"Take that card, my friend."

"I think I won't deprive you of it," said the driver. "What's the good of it to me?"

"Be a member of that Society," said the philanthropist.

"What shall I get by it?" asked the driver.

"Brotherhood," returned the passenger in a ferocious manner.

"Thankee," said the driver, very deliberately, as he got down; "my mother was contented with myself, and so am I. I don't want no brothers."

We leave our Mr. Honey-thunder to make the application. We cannot join his Society.

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY.

WHAT IT IS.—ITS POWER.

[By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, in "Steps of Belief."

It is a mistake made, almost universally, by Protestants, to regard the declaration of Papal infallibility by the Vatican Council as a mere theoretical assertion of impossible claims. Almost all Protestant writers are amused by it, and consider it as simply ridiculous. But we must not suppose that so sagacious a body as the Roman Curia have no important practical object in view in thus compelling the bishops to admit the infallibility of the Pope. It means a great deal practically. It is simply changing a constitutional monarchy into an absolute despotism. The Company of Jesus has always been such a despotism. Every member of it has been a soldier, bound to obey every order of his superiors without question. The present plan is to virtually transform the whole Catholic Church into the Company of Jesus. The motto of the whole Catholic Church will then be "Perinde ac cadaver." Every bishop will be bound to control his diocese according to directions from Rome. A papal brief will be like the order of the General of an army, to be obeyed absolutely, without hesitation, by every good Catholic.

"Not theirs to make reply,
Not theirs to reason why;
Theirs but to do or die."

The plan is, by this magnificent centralization, to give to the whole Catholic Church the aggressive power which has made the Company of Jesus such splendid soldiers in the service of the Pope. As a nation, in its hour of peril from internal rebellion or external foes, chooses a dictator, and puts the whole power in his hands, so the Catholic Church, perceiving how it is endangered by the advance of science and the spirit of the age, proposes to make the Pope an absolute dictator.

The object is a practical one, and perfectly logical. The declaration of infallibility is placing a secure theoretical foundation for the exercise of this absolute power. When this has once been declared, the Pope may, for example, forbid any Catholic children to go to schools, except such as are under the control of ecclesiastics of their own church. Any parent who disobeys will then be liable to excommunication. He can only choose between obedience and leaving the church. And every Catholic knows that to leave the church is to expose himself to an amount of social abuse and persecution which very few are strong enough to resist. The plan, then, is a fine piece of strategic wisdom. It is true that the bow may be so much bent as to break. A very possible result of carrying out this decree may be schism. It is quite possible that it may produce independent national churches in France, Spain, Austria, or Germany. These bodies, retaining their church buildings, priests, liturgies, as at present, would by no means be objectionable to the great mass of Catholics. To them the church means their own priest and their usual worship. So that, without becoming Protestants, or perceiving any change, they might become independent of Rome and of the papacy.

But it is idle to disguise the fact that there is a great conflict before us in this country,—not with Roman Catholics, nor with the Roman Catholic Church considered as a religion, but with the power of that organization as wielded by the Jesuits. To this compact, determined, relentless power, we Protestants present a scattered crowd of unorganized sects, a divided purpose and an unsettled creed. Not a Protestant church is certain of its own opinions. In the sixteenth century Protestants could oppose to the infallibility of the church the infallibility of the Bible. All Protestants believed in it then; how many believe in it now? As the Macedonian phalanx marched straight through the mob of Persian soldiers which called itself an army, so the Church of Rome, strong in its numbers and its union, laughs in derision at the divided sects of the Protestants, and anticipates a certain victory.

And its victory is certain, unless we have on our side one power which may essentially help us; and that is TRUTH. In the sixteenth century, three hundred and fifty years ago, truth, without organization, without numbers, with no prestige, no popularity,—truth uttered by the lips of a single man, Martin Luther,—shook all of Christendom to its centre and overthrew Romanism through half of Europe. On the side of Rome are numbers, prestige, organization, union; on the other side, freedom and truth. If the claim of Rome is false, nothing can save it. When the foundations of a building are giving way, no buttresses against the wall can keep it from coming down.

A religious woman who always kept Sunday and washed on Monday, and in fact all the rest of the week, as she was a washerwoman by occupation, had managed to scrape money enough to build a snug little house and barn in the country; and one afternoon, after she was comfortably settled, there came along a terrible tornado, which tore her barn to pieces and smashed a part of the house. The old lady's indignation was at first unspeakable, but at last she sobbed, "Well, here's a pretty piece of business. No matter, though; I'll pay for this—I'll wash on Sundays." Divine Providence is supposed to have met its match.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"DEAR FRIEND,—A mistaken motive has led you into grievous error. The ambition of Jesus, you say, is your reason for abandoning Unitarianism. Having never accepted Jesus Christ as God manifest in the flesh, his desire to lift mankind up you reckon the ambition of manhood! A proud ambition in God to stoop to save the lowly sons of earth! God himself desires the salvation of men, and has done much to save them. Leaving out your views concerning Jesus, and following out your notions of 'ambition,'—God is ambitious!

You have neglected to discover a distinction between holy and unholy ambition—or desire—a synonym!

To realize in your own soul the meaning of that saying—'ye must be born again'—is the surest way to get rid of skepticism. That you have never known the power of a present salvation in your own soul is evidenced by your rejection of Jesus Christ.

What meaneth this to you? 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.' To know its genuine meaning is to remove all your strange notions.

Any humble heart-converted as well as head-converted man can teach you the difference between believing in Christ as the devils did, and faith which 'with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.'

To you the Gospel has been 'foolishness,' but you can know it to be the 'power of God' by earnest prayer and an earnest search after the truth. Throw away your own notions, and take the teachings of the Spirit and Word of God.

And the reading carefully of the following works will help you to the light:—'Nelson on Infidelity,'—'Newton on Prophecy,'—Paley's 'Evidences of Christianity,'—Fabor's 'Difficulties of Infidelity,'—Horne's 'Introduction,' Vol. 1,—Wesley's 'Autobiography.'

Hoping to hear from you in your journey to the light and liberty of the Gospel, and with much anxiety, yours most cordially."

"INDEX No. 19, just received, if possible, gives me more satisfaction than any before, particularly on account of the sentiments promulgated by C. B. Webster on the old ideas concerning God.

I look upon it as a very interesting and important subject,—some rational idea of God. For twenty years my children have been growing up around me, and I have not during that time tried to instruct them concerning God, because I could form no idea myself, believing that 'men make God in their own image.'

I feel that I can learn a good deal from the perusal of your paper, and enclose a dollar for the balance of the year."

"I wish to subscribe for one of the bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1870. I enclose 25 cents for a copy of Nos. 15, 20, the Fifty Affirmations, and two copies of No. 17.) I wish these copies to lend, that my prejudiced friends may learn to appreciate a paper that I value more highly than any six papers in the country. I wish that some capitalist, emulous of Geo. Peabody's laurels, might scatter copies of THE INDEX as thick as Autumn leaves. Meanwhile I intend to devote some time towards making its merits known."

LOCAL NOTICES.

PUBLIC MEETING.—On Sunday morning, July 17, at 10½ o'clock, a public meeting of all persons interested in the maintenance of an unsectarian Common School System will be held in the Park at the terminus of the Adams Street Railroad, provided the weather is fair. Mr. F. E. Abbot will read an address on "The Bible in the Public Schools." Mr. Guido Marx, Hon. William Kraus, and Judge Ritchie will also make addresses on the same subject,—the former two in German. The German SAENGERBUND have kindly consented to be present and furnish music on the occasion. If the weather is foul, the meeting will be postponed till further notice.

RADICAL CLUB.—The RADICAL CLUB will meet in the church at the corner of Adams and Superior Streets Sunday evening, July 17, at 7½ o'clock. The report of the Committee on drawing up a petition for the exclusion of the Bible from the Public Schools will be submitted for consideration and action, amended according to the instructions of the CLUB at the previous meeting. All persons interested are invited to be present, and to speak with perfect freedom on either side of the question at issue.

Poetry.

THE CROWNING OF PETRARCH AT ROME:
A FRAGMENT.

Hark to the merry noise of flutes, that weave
A mazy web of harmonies divine,
Whose meshes the entangled spirit grieve
With sweet bewilderment and sorrows fine,
As when in mountain pine
The dying winds their faint, wild echoes leave.
'Tis holy Easter Day; and, dense with flowers,
The trampled pavements breathe of fresh May banks.
Big with expectancy, the lagging hours
Ply their slow pinions o'er the people's ranks,
Whose close phalanx
The air with multitudinous murmurs dowers.
He comes—and eager eyes on Petrarch stare,
And shouting tongues loud herald his renown;
From balconies that swarm with faces fair
White, rubied hands shower liquid perfumes down,
The imperial town
Musters her sons to welcome Glory's Heir.

The Index.

JULY 16, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

It is with great pleasure that we are permitted to print in this issue of THE INDEX the excellent Report of the Toledo delegates to the Northwestern Woman Suffrage Association, which was prepared and read by Mrs. Judge Collins in the church of the Independent Society, June 15. Mrs. Collins is the President of the Toledo Woman Suffrage Association, taking the place of Mrs. Ashley, who is now with her husband, Gov. Ashley, in Montana Territory; and if anything could reconcile the Association to Mrs. Ashley's removal and consequent resignation, it would be the grace, dignity, and success with which Mrs. Collins discharges the unaccustomed duties of her new office.

BAGGING AN ELEPHANT.

The Christian Register (which, we would remark for the information of our Western, and doubtless many also of our Eastern readers, is an antique Unitarian sheet published weekly in the village of Boston) has just returned from the chase, with exultation written all over its venerable but classic features, and with a couple of first-class ivory tusks protruding from the bag on its very respectable back. In its sportsman-like zeal for game, which forcibly reminds us of our old acquaintance Gordon Cumming, it deluded itself not long ago with the idea that it had captured Abraham Lincoln, and would have assigned him a very distinguished cage in its denominational menagerie, had not a Western hunter with a long rifle made good a prior claim to its fancied prey. But now it entertains not a shadow of doubt of its successful capture of Charles Dickens.

Alluding to the recent debate among the ecclesiastically-minded, as to whether the great and widely beloved novelist was a Christian or not, the Register thus solemnly extinguiques the sinful preachers who have dared to question his orthodoxy:—

"If the clerical revilers of Charles Dickens are capable of shame, they must have blushed deeply when they read his note written on the very day that he died:—

GADSHILL PLACE,
Higham by Rochester, Kent,
Wednesday, June 8, 1870.

Dear Sir:—It would be quite inconceivable to me—but for your letter—that any reasonable reader could possibly attach a scriptural reference to a passage in a book of mine, reproducing a much-abused social figure of speech, impressed into all sorts of service, on all sorts of inappropriate occasions, without the faintest connection of it with its original source. I am truly shocked to find that any reader can make the mistake. I have always striven in my writings to express veneration for the life and lessons of our Savior, because I feel it and because I re-wrote that history for my children, every one of whom knew it from having it repeated to them long before they could read and almost as soon as they could speak. But I have never made proclamation of this from the house-tops.

Faithfully yours,

CHARLES DICKENS."

There can be no more doubt about it. The case is decided. The controversy is settled. Charles Dickens was a Christian, and it would be slander to intimate that he was not also a Unitarian. He "venerated" the life and teachings of Jesus, and called him "our Savior." What further proof of his Christianity could be desired? Has he not pronounced the shibboleth without fault?

To be sure, the Methodist Zion's Herald is not quite so sanguine. Commenting on this same letter of Mr. Dickens, it says:—

"This view of Christ is not necessarily regenerative. Many a skeptic could do all he did. Mr. Abbot is as complimentary. All we can say of this soul is, he made his own choice. If he accepted the offers of salvation made to every poor sinner, as we humbly hope he did, he was saved; if not, not."

But then Zion's Herald is a little more exacting than the Christian Register. It is not so easily satisfied by a chance phrase. It believes that every Christian should be "regenerated;" whereas the Register is apparently satisfied if he can say "our Savior." Logically translating the above prefatory remark, we have the following syllogism:—

Major premise. Whoever can say "our Savior" is a Christian.

Minor premise. Charles Dickens says "our Savior."

Conclusion. Therefore—BLUSH, O ye defamers who doubt his Christianity!

This is the implied argument of the Register; otherwise its missile hurled at the "clerical revilers" would turn out to be a boomerang, and the charge of reviling would lie at the door of those who undeservedly call ministers hard names. Unless the vague phraseology of the letter is a proof of Dickens' Christianity, what relevancy has it in the discussion? Any one who has a more rational test of Christianity than the Register's shibboleth, will get no light on the point at issue from this letter.

But there are many kinds of Christians; and the Register can not be quite easy till it has proved that Dickens was no more of a Christian than itself. It would be a disaster "altogether tolerable and not to be endured," if the Orthodox should run away with him, after all! So the first shot must be followed up by another, as the subjoined paragraph from the succeeding issue of the Register shows:—

"The Transcript says that Dickens was never formally connected with any religious sect, but his rule was to worship with the Unitarians. While living in London, he attended one of their places of worship regularly, and had a family pew there.

In his 'Change for American Notes,' Dickens paid a cordial tribute to Rev. Dr. Eliot, of St. Louis, and to other Unitarian ministers whom he had met in America."

Here we have demonstration on demonstration,—"Ossa on Pelion piled." Mr. Dickens went to a Unitarian meeting, and complimented Unitarian ministers! Nobody ever goes to church in these days, without believing all that the minister says. And nobody compliments a minister without subscribing to his creed. We advise the Register not to be caught hereafter in an Orthodox church, on peril of an indictment of apostasy from Unitarianism; and any further laudations of Beecher or Murray in its columns will henceforth excite the gravest suspicions of some secret hankerings on its part after the flesh-pots of orthodoxy.

What a shame it would be, if the venerable Nimrod had not "bagged the elephant" after all! We cannot contemplate the bare possibility without a shudder! No—we put implicit faith in those tusks.

A MOVE IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

Several weeks ago, in publishing the Articles of Association of the Radical Club of Toledo, we expressed the hope that other such Clubs might start into existence all over the country. The first, so far as we know, was formed in Boston in 1867, mainly through the indefatigable energy of Rev. Edward C. Towne, then of Medford, Mass., and now of Winnetka, Ill. That these Clubs are destined to play an important part in the future, we have not the slightest doubt. The suggestions of our esteemed correspondent and friend, Mr. H. L. Green, in the communication which we print this morning, are worthy of especial notice. We are very glad to learn that a Radical Club has been formed in Syracuse. Its officers are excellent, and so are its Articles of Association. Not until the liberals of the country begin to organize for discussion and for action, will the influence they ought to exert be felt to any great extent.

The time is near at hand when the interests of freedom, civil as well as religious, will imperatively demand the ORGANIZED ACTION of all its friends. While the evangelical people of the country are concentrating, and seeking to strengthen themselves by union, those who look upon their objects with distrust will be wise to unite for nobler objects. Questions that involve the rights of free speech and free thought are getting gradually into politics; and it will not be long before these questions will come up everywhere at the polls.

Whoever regards this as an idle prophecy, must be strangely blind to the signs of the times. Only a fortnight ago we published an earnest appeal by an orthodox clergyman to the Christian community to vote only for candidates who are pledged to enforce the Sabbath observance of Sunday. The election of members of the Board of Education in Cincinnati last spring hinged so completely on theological issues, that the contestants were known respectively as the "Bible" and "anti-Bible" parties. And so on. If the liberals are wise, they will organize speedily for the protection of their spiritual liberty. No one could be less desirous than we of forming a new "sect"; but it is high time to shake off the apathy with which too many liberals contemplate the shrewd, politic orthodoxy of the day.

Because Henry Ward Beecher is "liberalizing" the orthodox world of America, credulous radicals infer that orthodoxy will perish without a struggle. Not so. All history teaches the contrary. What means the increasing influence of the Evangelical Alliance, and the shameless impudence with which the signatures of Grant, Colfax, and Fish, the highest officials of the republic, were secured to an antecedent endorsement of its proceedings? What means the crafty dishonesty with which their official titles were afterwards appended to their names, and thus the seeming sanction of the National Government obtained beforehand for the doings of a sectarian convention? When such barefaced yet successful attempts are made to bolster up the tottering Church with State authority, he must be blind as a mole who discerns no danger to spiritual freedom. "In time of peace prepare for war." Let all who are in earnest to make America really free bestir themselves, and organize little bands of "Wide-Awakes" against the hour of peril.

FREE RELIGION.

Every intelligent human being forms an ideal conception of what he or she ought to be, in order to the realization of the highest degree of happiness.

The desire and effort to reach this ideal is religion. Whatever narrows the thought or trammels the action of an individual, hinders the progress of the soul in its effort to attain its ideal. This the historical systems of worship of all time have done, and this the prevailing systems of to-day are doing. Catholicism utterly subjugates the soul and imprisons every faculty of thought. A bull of the Pope blocks every pathway of progress, threatening eternal death to each daring innovator. Protestantism, while denouncing the absurd pretensions of the Pope and church, swears allegiance to a dogmatic creed, which, having its origin near two thousand years ago, has come down to us through the dark ages, subject to various revisions and innumerable interpolations at the hands of a cunning and unscrupulous priesthood. On the hypothesis that the New Testament has not been trified with by the mediæval monks, (which hypothesis we know is false,) still the highest claim that can be made for it rationally, is that it presents a resumé of the history of the religious ideas and habits of Jesus of Nazareth and his immediate disciples, whom to endow with infallibility is, to say the least, as absurd as the action of the recent Ecumenical Council.

Neither Catholicism nor Protestantism can claim to be religion. The first is an absolute despotism; the latter constitutional monarchy. Unitarianism, although neither Catholic nor Protestant, is still not religion, inasmuch as it defends a creed, worships a man, and venerates rites. This denomination may be justly termed a republic, a representative government, in which the elements of freedom and tyranny are about equal, and in which the irrepressible conflict between these antagonistic principles is continually being waged. A prophet of old has said that a "house divided against itself will surely fall;" and it requires no prophetic vision to discover that Unitarianism will ere long grow into democracy or degenerate into a monarchy. It has honored teachers who boldly denounce democracy as anarchy and earnestly advocate the claims of monarchy. Others it has (who, if not the most honored, are at least the most talented,) whose views are heard in every council pleading for liberty of conscience and freedom of thought. On the whole, they are in favor of FREE RELIGION.

The editor of the American Spiritualist has manifested an earnest wish to know what Free Religion is; and since he is not satisfied with the able and lucid definitions given by the editor of THE INDEX, I have felt called upon to express my views. For the sake of clearness allow me to recapitulate briefly.

First, Religion is the desire and effort of a human soul to realize its ideal of perfection and ideal of happiness.

Secondly, all systems of faith which tend to prevent this are the foes of religion.

Thirdly, Unitarianism is the result of an effort to unite the antagonistic principles of freedom and slavery.

And, fourthly, religion can flourish only when the principles of freedom are practically recognized.

Religion is in no sense a creed or system of belief. An atheist may be a very religious person, and a deist or spiritualist a very irreligious one. In this connection, I must be allowed to say that the efforts of certain spiritualists to establish a church on the basis of faith in immortality and spirit-communication is an exceedingly unfortunate movement, and one which is deprecated by many, if not all, the best and clearest thinkers who accept spiritualism as a fact, but not as a religion. During a recent conversation with Andrew Jackson Davis, I asked his opinion of the free religious movement. He answered promptly, "I am in full sympathy with it. And when it becomes vitalized by the facts of spiritualism, (as it will ere long,) it will triumph over all opposition." He added,—"I do not sympathize with the effort to organize a church on spiritualism, for the reason that spiritualism is a 'fact, not a religion.' Mr. Davis is a philosopher, as well as a spiritualist; hence his clear conception of the difference between religion and a system of mediumistic revelations. Christianity is to-day but the skeleton of what was once a spiritual church based solely upon mediumistic revelations. What enlightened spiritualist wishes to repeat the mistakes of the Christian fathers? Surely not the intelligent editor of the American Spiritualist."

A NEW RADICAL CLUB.

FRIEND ABBOT,—We have just organized a RADICAL CLUB for this city, as you will see by the following report taken from one of our city papers. And why should not such a club be organized in every city and large town throughout the country, and in every other place where half a dozen friends of Free Religion can be found? Such clubs, in my humble opinion, would prove an important auxiliary in the work of promulgating liberal views and promoting honest investigation. Five hundred such should be organized during the next three months, and report themselves to the Secretary of the Free Religious Association.

These Radical Clubs, acting in concert and making report of their proceedings through the columns of THE INDEX, would tend to stimulate earnest thought and action in every part of the country, and prepare the people for the coming conflict of principles that is evidently to be fought out in this country between the friends and enemies of religious freedom.

OFF THE TRACK.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., June 30, 1870.

MR ABBOT:—Reading THE INDEX, and reflecting on Religion in general and Free Religion in particular, and in mind comparing all with the Religion taught by Christ, I could see no religious doctrines superior to or freer than those taught by him. The doctrines of Christ as to morals are as plainly stated, and as unexceptionable in import, as I find them explained anywhere else. Now, so far as the matter of faith is concerned, it is not improper, and it is very common, that the life and works of the teacher should have some influence in producing it. Christ may have claimed a little for his doctrines on this ground, but the strong point is "belief for the truth's sake." Here the nail is hit exactly on the head. This leaves man to seek the truth from all sources according to the best of his ability; and, having, as he may think, found it, to believe and act upon it according to his own convictions. Can you ask for anything more free than this? Do you want anything freer than this? It is true, the teachings of the churches have taken away this freedom in a great measure from their membership, and have tried hard to force belief for many reasons other than "the truth's sake,"—yes, enforced beliefs plainly in opposition to truth. Now, I am opposed to trying to deprive the Nazarene of the honor due him in this particular, and crowning the head of any one else with it. That his teachings have been perverted is no fault of his. It should be remembered that the lowly and obscure Jesus came into the world when the universal belief of all nations was that man's sins had so offended the power and wisdom which created him, that he required sacrifice at the hands of his creatures in order to appease his justly offended majesty. And they were acting accordingly. Such was the condition of the world when this obscure man, born in a manger, reared in a little town the name of which was a reproach, called about him a few fishermen, and, without anywhere to lay his head, went about the world denouncing its whole system of theology in this particular, and erected in its stead, as man's whole duty and God's entire requirement of him, "love to God and man,"—carried it out in practice, and simply asked man to believe it "for the truth's sake." Says Jesus, "For this cause am I come into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." At another time he said to the Jews, "You say I deserve death because I say I am the Son of God. This is all a pretence, for in your law, 'those to whom the word of the Lord came are called Gods.' No, no, it is not for this—for this is a common kind of expression among you—but it is because I have told you the truth."

To believe the truth for the truth's sake is just the kind of freedom we want, on all other subjects as well as religion. Now I submit whether it is quite just in your Association to try to snatch the laurels so bravely and dearly won from the brows of him in Bethlehem born, and weave it around your own? Had you not, then, better take down your flag, and fight under the banner of the cross? Then would THE INDEX be a titbit.

EDWARD L. CRANE.

"ECHOES FROM ANNIVERSARY WEEK."

F. E. Abbot, Esq.:

DEAR SIR:—I wish briefly to notice a few remarks of Mrs. Howe, published from the Woman's Journal in THE INDEX of July 2,—particularly those contained in the fourth paragraph and commencing with—"Mr. Abbot, &c." The idea that Mr. A. or any other man, or any number of men composing the present small minority, opposed (for satisfactory reasons) to the dominant church, are, or can become, whilst in such minority, persecutors of said church, is, perhaps, a peculiarity of the mind which gave it birth. It is certainly unique, if not simply ridiculous. I have always thought that all persecutions are of the combined many against the few. All that the unpopular few can say or do against the popular many, seems to me to warrant the latter adjective.

Another expression, "the church in its less instructed periods"—why, the dear lady's own views of the church, elsewhere expressed, seem to constitute a proclamation of its present imbecility and a protest against its present rule! Does the kind and learned lady forget that "the instinct of the one man power was never more forcibly illustrated," than when the consecrated author of the primitive Christian faith and founder of the Christian church "forced his views upon the consciousness of the whole world?" It will not do to plead for him an exclusive right, for that remains to be proved, as he never assumed it himself. But did he or his one view, "negating the sight of all other eyes, &c.," illustrate the effects she affirms?

Again. If the sphere of man's judgment can only be enlarged by "seeing with the eyes and feeling with the hearts of many men" (and some women?), whence originates elevated thought and feeling? Can the effects produced be greater than their cause? How many nothings will make something? How many inferior thoughts constitute a superior one? As physical elevation secures wider scope for the exercise of natural vision, so mental elevation secures enlarged perception and elevated thought and feeling. But whence comes mental elevation? It is an effect—what is its cause?

The lady also objects to "Christolatry" and "Bibliolatry," and thinks them inimical to the Christ's doctrine or the pursuit thereof. But where does she find these olatrics? Does not the church claim to be the exclusive conservatory of his doctrine, as well as the advocate of his personal worship? But enough.

Truly yours,

K. N.

DELEGATES' REPORT TO THE TOLEDO WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION,

Read by Mrs. Collins at the regular meeting of the Association June 15, 1870.

In response to the call for the "NORTHWESTERN WOMAN'S FRANCHISE ASSOCIATION" we, Mrs. Barker and myself, were appointed as delegates from the TOLEDO WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION, and attended the meetings which were advertised to be held in Farwell Hall, Chicago, May 25th & 26th, and which we have the honor at this time to report.

WEDNESDAY, A. M., MAY 25.

The first morning's meeting was of an informal nature; the business transacted was chiefly the receiving of delegates, introducing, registering and assigning places. Between 50 and 60 delegates were present before the close of the meeting, representing eight States—Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri. Miss Anthony entered before the close of the morning's session, and was warmly greeted.

P. M.—The first hours of the afternoon were given to business. Resolutions were adopted, providing that no one should speak more than twice in one session, nor longer than one half hour. Dr. Blake, of Chicago, acted as President pro tem. A Vice-president from each State represented was chosen to sit upon the platform. The Secretary also occupied a place there, and during the speeches Committees on Constitution and Resolutions, and one on the nomination of Officers for the new Organization were selected. Mrs. Barker was chosen on the Committee for Resolutions, and Mrs. Collins on that for nomination of Officers.

A paper, previously drawn up by Judge Waite, was submitted to the Committee on Resolutions, and voted upon. Reference will be made to these Resolutions hereafter.

The Committee on Organization was requested to meet at 9 A. M. the next day and vote on Officers; and the meeting adjourned, having listened to speeches from Mrs. Dr. Spalding, Miss Couzens, Miss Peckham and Miss Anthony. Miss Anthony and Miss Peckham urged work rather than talk.

In the evening, an admittance fee being charged, the body of Farwell Hall was about three-quarters filled with an intelligent and appreciative audience, a great proportion of whom were gentlemen, who evidently enjoy attending meetings where women are speakers, though they do sometimes hear remarks not complimentary to themselves. Such was their fate this evening, for the speech of Mrs. Victor, though very amusing, was very severe in its tone towards men in general, and reporters in particular. (It was afterwards explained that she was paying off old debts to the latter.)

Miss Couzens arose to reply to what she called this "tirade," deprecating this way of talking, saying that men, too, had been victims of ignorance and barbarism, and were not responsible for the condition in which woman found herself; that, whenever the subject was presented to men kindly and fairly, they were generally ready to grant all that women asked. She read a telegram received from G. F. Train, also one from Marshall County, expressing fellowship and sympathy.

After a few remarks from Mrs. Willard, we listened to a speech from Miss Peckham, one of the longest and best of the evening, which was heard with great interest and approbation by the audience.

Miss Anthony then rose to speak, showing the necessity for the working woman as well as the working man to have the protection of the ballot, and giving the reason (namely that of ignorance) why, in the hands of the former, it was not the entire protection it should be. She said that this state of things was being remedied; that National Labor Congresses, &c., were enlightening the minds of the masses, showing them where their real strength and protection lies, and would, eventually, put an end to the system of strikes, which was the only way they ever knew to assert themselves and obtain justice. Still, while deprecating this method, she said that it was in a manner successful for men but not for women, who had followed the example of men, seeing what it had done for them.

She cited a case occurring during the war, in which one hundred teachers of Detroit struck for higher wages. She said there were no concessions made; they were told to go back to their work at the old prices, or their places would be filled by others who stood waiting; and, after work was resumed on the same terms, the Board of Education found out the writer of articles which had been published in relation to the matter, and summarily dismissed her, thus discharging the oldest and ablest teacher from their employ. "Who doubts," Miss Anthony asked, "if women had the ballot, their power, equal to that of men, to obtain concessions to just demands, and protect themselves from injury and insult to which, otherwise, they must submit?"

THURSDAY, A. M., MAY 25.

The first morning hour was occupied by the Committees on Organization, and that on Constitution and Resolutions. While this business was being transacted, Mrs. Mott, of Chicago, greatly interested the audience in a speech, the purport of which was that women could do business, and be treated with courtesy by men and as men were treated (with respectful attention), if they would go about it in a business manner. She proved this by her own experience, having herself carried on business for some time without embarrassment on account of sex.

Giles B. Stebbins, from Detroit, followed, advocating the joint education of the sexes. Then the discussion and adoption of the Constitution took place. It is as follows:—

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1. This Association shall be called the North-western Woman Suffrage Association.

ART. 2. The object of this Association shall be to obtain for woman the right of suffrage on terms of perfect equality with man. For the accomplishment of this purpose it stands unequivocally committed to, and will use its power in favor of, the adoption of the so-called Sixteenth Amendment of the United States.

ART. 3. Any person favoring this object may become a member by signing the constitution.

ART. 4. ART. 7. The annual meeting of this Association, for the election of Officers and the transaction of business, shall be held in the month of November, at such place and on such day as the Executive Committee shall determine.

ART. 8. Any State or local society formed to aid in securing suffrage for women, may become auxiliary to this Association.

ART. 9. A special meeting may be called at any time by the President, and shall be called at the request of the Executive Committee.

ART. 10. No distinction shall be made by this Association on account of party, color, creed, race or sex.

ART. 11. This constitution may be amended at any regular meeting of the Association, by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

The Committee on Organization reported the list of Officers as follows:—

PRESIDENT—Mrs. Hazlitt, of Michigan.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Robert J. Ingersoll, Illinois; Miss Boynton, Indiana; Mrs. Fairchild, Wisconsin; Mary J. Colburn, Minnesota; Henry O'Connor, Iowa; G. B. Stebbins, Michigan; Miss Couzens, Missouri; Mrs. Miriam M. Cole, Ohio.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE—Judge Waite, Col. Fox, Geo. W. Julian, Lillie Peckham, Sarah B. Stearns, Augusta J. Chapin, Mrs. Collins.

RECORDING SECRETARY—Mrs. Brooks.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY—Mrs. Loomis.

TREASURER—Fernando Jones. (All of Chicago.)

Mrs. Hazlitt took the chair, and made a few introductory remarks, deferring a formal speech till evening.

P. M.—The first business of the afternoon was the election of a Finance Committee, consisting of Dr. Blake, Chicago; Rev. Mr. Eddy, Milwaukee; and Dr. Keckeler, of Cincinnati.

Resolutions were read by Judge Waite, as follows:

Whereas, The second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and it has been held by high political authority that the privileges and immunities here referred to include the elective franchise, and

Whereas, It is now universally conceded women are citizens, and they are declared to be such in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution; and

Whereas, To remove all doubts as to the political rights of a large class of citizens heretofore held in subjection, a declaratory amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been adopted, removing from that class the disabilities heretofore existing; therefore

Resolved, That we are in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, recognizing and guaranteeing the right of women to exercise the elective franchise on equal terms with all other citizens.

Miss Anthony supported the resolutions. Then followed speeches from the Rev. Mr. Meyers and Mrs. Newt; also from Miss Boynton, who dwelt particularly on the natural courtesy and chivalry inherent in the American character, believing that it would not desert our men when they meet women at the polls.

A Methodist sister and class-leader greatly pleased the audience, and was the means of at least one conversion to the cause of Woman Suffrage. Miss Anthony urged work for securing the Sixteenth Amendment. Judge Waite declared that women now have the right to vote, quoting proofs.

The petition for names was circulated among the audience during the speaking, and Mrs. Ballou, of Minnesota, addressed the meeting, claiming pre-eminence for her State in this battle for reform, and urging that women should prove their right to vote by voting.

In the evening Rev. Miss Chapin, of Iowa, addressed the Convention, and was followed by Mrs. Hazlitt in an able speech. She demanded the ballot for woman as a right; she did not ask it as a favor.

Miss Couzens then alluded to the failure of colored men to recognize the efforts of women in their behalf. Miss Boynton referred to the exclusion of women from the colleges. It being announced that G. F. Train was in the Hall, he was called for by the audience invited to the platform, received and introduced by Miss Anthony. He entertained the audience for a while in his peculiar manner.

The meeting was then adjourned till the month of November. The Convention was considered by its managers a success, ONE THOUSAND persons having been in attendance upon the afternoon session of the second day, and at no time less than TWO HUNDRED. The audience was refined and intelligent, and all the proceedings were decorous and in order.

REMARKS.

And now, having given you a brief summary of the two days exercises of the Convention held in Farwell Hall, we would remark somewhat upon the character of those calling and managing the Convention, with some of whom a longer stay in Chicago afforded the opportunity of personal acquaintance.

If the principle we advocate, that of woman's political and legal equality with man, be right,—if our claim be just,—then the character of those asserting it cannot add to or detract from its worth; and yet it is but natural that we should like to be found in good company. It is especially so, when we hear on all sides from those opposed and often from those unenlightened, really believing what they say, the cry—"This new doctrine is that of unbelievers, of persons of loose morals, of persons who covet notoriety; it tends to infidelity, to the destruction of all that is pure and lovely in woman; it will end in anarchy and ruin!"

It cannot be denied that all creeds, as well as all shades of freethought, have their representatives in the ranks of the Woman Suffrage party, nor do we believe that every leader or every private in its vast army is immaculate in life or strictly pure in aim. Why should we believe it? The tares must grow with the wheat. There are blemishes in every character, and imperfections in every human enterprise. But what we disbelieve and deny is that the great mass of those interested in this movement are persons destitute of religious faith or moral principle, not honestly seeking and truly hoping for good in this reform.

Those calling and guiding, as well as those addressing the Convention at Chicago, were in many instances members of orthodox churches, persons high in business and social positions, and of acknowledged worth. Let us add for the benefit of those who would attach more importance to this item, that wealth and fashion were also fully represented. The refined, wealthy and elegant were conspicuous upon its platforms, side by side with the plainly attired, uncultivated, but earnest workers from our far western States. One of these, a Methodist sister, looking back fifty years, contrasted the then existing state of public sentiment and its effects, with what she now saw and heard. She said, when a child and living in Ohio, it was not considered necessary to teach girls to read; that when first agitated, this practice was strongly opposed, on account of its demoralizing tendency, as it would certainly result in the writing of love letters to the boys! She stated that during the war of 1812 women would come, running and weeping, with letters from their absent husbands, three or four miles to her young brother, unable to read a word of them themselves.

We have already referred to one feature of the attendance upon this Convention which was not noticed by the papers. Indeed it was directly asserted by them that the attendance was chiefly ladies. We observed with surprise the large number of gentlemen present at every session, during the day as well as the evening. In the management of the meetings gentlemen of the Association, equally with ladies, participated, and with apparent equal interest. Both men and women worked together in seeking to establish what some consider the antagonistic doctrine of woman's rights.

The tone of discussion was generally, not bitter, but calm, persuasive, earnest,—both men and women seeming to feel that, when woman asks for herself, she pleads equally for man's interest; that, seeking for herself a wider range of thought and occupation and a better education, feeling a deeper sense of responsibility, and seeking means to qualify herself for these responsibilities, she seeks to establish a truer companionship for man, to fit herself to be a more efficient helpmate to her husband, a better guide to son and brother. The prevailing feeling seemed to be that not woman's rights alone, but woman's duties also, call upon her to assert her claim to citizenship; that private indifference or unwillingness must be sacrificed to public need. Woman is wanted, not as a mere listless spectator in the drama of life, but as an active worker in the great questions of the age. To work well, she must have with man equal power and equal opportunities to qualify herself for the work.

We understand that the formation of the Northwestern Woman Suffrage Association has not at all arisen from antagonism to any previously formed association, but believe that it has grown out of the necessities of the hour. It is exceedingly difficult for those interested in the work in the far-off States and Territories to attend Conventions and Anniversaries held in New York or Boston; meetings in parts of a less extended territory, and conference between those residing therein may be more easily managed. For convenience of meeting and efficiency in work this Association has been formed, auxiliary to neither of the Eastern Societies, friendly to both; its present and most pressing aim is identical with theirs, namely, the passage of the Sixteenth Amendment.

To facilitate this, State organization and connection with this Association seem desirable, and efforts are to be made to that end. The means needed to accomplish this State conversion and organization, and eventually the passage of the Sixteenth Amendment, must come in some way from those interested in the reform. Nothing can be accomplished without money. Upon the Finance Committee devolves the task of devising ways of raising it. While they are deliberating, we can assure you, ladies and gentlemen, members of the Toledo Association, professedly interested in the success of the movement, that material aid as well as sympathy is necessary to its accomplishment.

Whatever is raised in Ohio, either by assessment, contribution or subscription will be, as far as possible, expended here. We shall till our home fields and reap the results of our own labor.

Our President, Mrs. Hazlitt, is living almost in our midst, being a resident of Hillsdale, Michigan. We have reason to congratulate ourselves on our choice. She is a lady young in years, refined, cultivated and efficient; it is said of the highest social position, also, and a professing Christian. Upon her election, she took the chair and presided with great grace and ability over the Convention. Have we not just grounds for confidence in the talent and undeveloped powers of women, when we see the readiness with which they adapt themselves to men's positions, learning so soon self possession and self-reliance?

While we could not feel that, in reporting the meetings of the late Convention, the Chicago papers gave a perfectly fair report, we learned that the tone of the press was so much better than it ever had been before, that those most interested were perfectly satisfied with the way in which they were represented.

Looking upon the reporters, mostly youths, scarcely men in age or size, unqualified to understand the significance of the movement, and intent only to make something amusing and calculated to catch the popular ear, we wondered less at the general tone of the reports of Woman's Rights Conventions. At the regular meetings of the Cook County Association, at which four reporters were present, we noticed one lady reporter. It is fair to suppose that she was in full sympathy with the reform; at any rate, having so far reaped the benefit of it, she should have been.

Having touched upon all points likely to interest those who appointed us delegates and representatives to this Convention, we bring our report to a close. We hope to have in some measure transmitted to them what we gained for ourselves by immediate contact with earnest and hopeful workers in a common cause, namely, clearer views, a renewed interest, and a strengthened hope in the final success of what is often styled the woman movement. This term means a reaching after added breadth and depth and height and strength to woman's life; a greater capacity to bless and be blessed; a possible gratification of taste; a rise for talent; freedom henceforth to live and act with none but God, who gave her her nature and her powers, to determine for her where and how far they shall lead her.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R.I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.

PROGRESS, NOT REGRESSION.

The Free Religious Association aims to do justice to all religions that exist or have ever existed. It is especially interested in the new science of comparative theology, by which the religions are brought side by side to be impartially studied, without any prepossession in favor of one more than another. Only in this way can a scientific comprehension and statement of the religious development of mankind ever be reached. And this study discloses not only the differences, the antipathies, that keep the religions apart, but underneath these differences and antipathies a wonderful agreement in the essentials of spiritual and ethical thought. All the modern researches into the old religions or into the ancient records of those that are still vigorous, produce fresh proofs of this fundamental kinship and identity. Scholars are bringing us sentences out of the Sacred Books of India and China, that may be put with perfect concord into the Sermon on the Mount, and beside the exquisite Parable of the Prodigal Son. It is one of the practical aims of the Free Religious Association to set forth these underlying agreements and sympathies that bind the religions and races together into one family. The Association does not assume that religions or races have sprung from one root. That is a question (for, though double in form, the question is doubtless one in substance) on which science has not yet definitely spoken. But it asks whether the religions have not enough in common to treat each other with fraternal respect and courtesy, and whether, through the development of their common elements, they may not gradually wear away the antagonisms that separate them, and come into a practical spiritual fellowship. In the interest of this inquiry and aim, the Association at its late annual meeting gave one session exclusively to the consideration of the "Sympathies of Religions;" and to illustrate the general theme, several speakers contributed information with regard to some of the more important religions outside of Christianity.

But because the Association takes this ground, and aims to do justice to every form of religion, some persons appear to think that it has seriously set itself to the task of resuscitating the old religions; that it declares them superior to Christianity, and that it is trying to reverse the natural order of development and "carry religion back to its ante-Christian status and interpretation." Even so intelligent a person as Mrs. Julia Ward Howe—the clause just quoted is from her—made some criticisms of this kind in her essay read at the annual meeting of the Association last year, and indulged in some sharp satire on the great advantages of America for the introduction of the Oriental and Pagan customs of burning widows, strangling female infants, and offering children to the river-gods. And this year Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan, the well-known Spiritualistic speaker, makes a similar charge in a letter to the Cleveland American Spiritualist; and the editor of the Spiritualist says "her criticisms on the Free Religious Association are deservedly just." It is not difficult to see that a large part of Mrs. Tappan's grievance is that Spiritualism was not specifically represented at the meeting this year; a most unreasonable criticism, since no ism and no sect was represented as such. At each of the three previous meetings Spiritualism, like other systems of theology, had its invited speaker. Last year it had two invited speakers, Mrs. Tappan being one of the two. The plan of this year's meeting did not admit of any specific statement of Spiritualism, any more than it did of Universalism or Quakerism. That no believers in Spiritualism spoke at the meeting on any of the topics presented, is more than we can say. Certainly to exclude Spiritualists from its platform is about the last thing the Association would think of doing. But Mrs. Tappan does not put her charge in this direct form. She shapes it rather after the fashion of Mrs. Howe's criticism. She says that the Association welcomes the "dead religions of the past" and repulses the "live and breathing religion of to-day;" that "even Christianity is ignored by these iconoclasts." And she argues that the Association is an organization without a soul, is already dead, because to her it seems to look backward to resuscitate the old religions rather than around and forward to accept the living inspiration that is making religion for this and the coming age.

Such criticism betrays an almost incredible misapprehension of the position and aims of the Free Religious Association, and of the general tendencies which it represents. We may claim to have a pretty intimate acquaintance with the thought and purpose of the men and women who have been from the beginning most active in behalf of its interests. For a number of years we have been conversant with the various phases of religious Radicalism in general. We know it from its mildest to its wildest forms. And it may, therefore, allay the anxiety of critics of this class if we here affirm, that since the days of the queer old Thomas Taylor, the English Platonist, who is said to have lost his lodgings because his landlady discovered that he was making preparations to sacrifice a bull to Jupiter in her back parlor, we have not heard of any body who proposed to reinstate any of the so-called pagan religions, or to ignore Christianity and go back of it in the order of religious development as if it had never been! We believe that our good friends Dr. Bartol and Mr. and Mrs. Sargent, who have generously entertained the Radical Club, have never expressed any fear that their hospitable parlors would be asked for by any enthusiastic imitator of odd Thomas Taylor's peculiar type of piety; nor have we learned that the Baptist Association that owns Tremont Temple, has any apprehension of finding it, after Friday of Anniversary Week, converted into a Pantheon, and stocked with images of the ancient gods and goddesses of all the religions for the convenience of modern worshippers.

If there is one thing which members of the Free Religious Association have proclaimed more than another with regard to religion, it is that there is a natural historic order of religious development,—a steady progress of religious ideas from certain primitive germs, and that the specific religions are so many phases and stages of this progress, brought about by the different conditions under which development has taken place. It is to show the relationship of the religions to one another as phases and expressions of one spiritual substance that rationalists refer to the old religions, and endeavor to excite an interest in them; not that they suppose that the order of development is to be reversed, or that any of the religions, especially the latest, can be spared from the line. Nor do they suppose that the order of development has now reached its ultimate. They do not believe that the religious sentiment is historically exhausted, and has spoken the final word of absolute religion. They believe that it is still capable of progress. And the Free Religious Association would represent this present and perpetual capacity of the religious sentiment. Not retrogression, no mere summing up of the virtues of past religions, but the continuous vitality of the religious sentiment with increasing power to beget religion, as its principle. It declares for the emancipation of religion from bondage to ecclesiasticism, to creeds, to ritual, and from the limitations of special historic epochs and persons, in order that, freed from the necessity of defending old claims, and using freely all the wealth of resources gathered in the past, the religious sentiment may apply its whole power to the world's present work. And therefore, while the Association would reverence and use the whole of the past, and not eighteen hundred years of one historic movement alone, it cordially invites to its fellowship, and includes, whether they accept the invitation or not, all souls of whatever faith who are anywhere in contact with "the live and breathing religion of to-day."

The Index,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY
BY THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,
AT
TOLEDO, . . . OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE DOVE'S DEPARTURE.

[Read to the partially-formed Independent Society in Dover, N. H., May 17, 1868, just after leaving the Christian Church.]

"Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest."

Ps. LV, 6.

If one word, more than all others, is universally descriptive of the human heart, I think it is the word restlessness. Never yet was the condition of man, woman, or child so perfect in bliss, as to forestall the quick demands of imagination. Alexander the Great, when he had planted his foot on the neck of his last foe, wept, as every school-boy is taught, because he had no more worlds to conquer. As well dream of overtaking one's shadow, as of filling up the measure of desire. There is that in the soul, finite though it be, which forbids it to find a resting-place within "The flaming bounds of space and time."

Out of the delirium of ecstasy itself, as truly as out of the abyss of wretchedness, leaps the cry of David—"Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest!"

Civilization only intensifies this universal restlessness of man. The savage is comparatively in content; but the man of letters and the man of affairs, the deliver for gold, the schemer for place, the butterfly of fashion, the slave of pleasure, the hunter of glory, the worker for reform, the devotee in his closet,—all are grasping at a prize which seems everlastingly out of reach. The ideal itself no sooner becomes in a measure real, than it palls upon the taste. Success itself loses its fine flavor when it ceases to be a hope. The old Greek fable makes Io, in penalty for loving the king of the celestials, wander over the whole earth, stung by a pitiless gnat. That is the upshot of all converse with the gods. The sunrise of thought is the sunset of repose; the beginning of spiritual consciousness is departure on an endless journey.

The surface of society is as wrinkled with waves as the broad bosom of the sea, and the unending motion in communities is but the spiritual restlessness of man made visible. You gain your end; but what of it? It straightway ceases to charm. The thorns of care, the monotony of ease, the frictions of business, the satieties of idleness, the privations of poverty, the ennui of wealth, the pangs of sorrow, the intoxications of joy,—in a word, all experiences of man,—but foster the consuming fires of spiritual unrest.

Neither intellect, affection, nor will, can ever attain its object except in part. Human life, if measured by the success of human plans, is but a synonym for disappointment.

It is to feed the soul, hungry for a diet more juicy than the husks of swine, that the Church exists. Its origin and support is the spiritual restlessness of man. Strike out this factor of human nature, and religion itself disappears. To men and women, eager for better things, anxious for some solution of life's enigma that shall not mock all noble hopes, the Christian Church declares in the name of its Master and Head—"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you REST." The profound, eternal restlessness of man, which nothing in the world's gift can quiet, the Christian Church promises to soothe into spiritual peace; and so long as it can make its promise good, so long will it thrive and prosper. But it exacts a rigorous observance of its one condition, without which its power is paralyzed. It will bestow peace, but in return demands obedience—it will give rest, but requires faith. The power of Christianity to grant peace to man's troubled spirit depends absolutely on his faith in Christ; the New Testament, no less than observation and experience, surely makes this plain. Jesus made faith in himself as the Christ the one condition of discipleship, and could do nothing for those in whom this faith was absent. His power to help and bless did not extend beyond those who could "take his yoke upon them;" and so it is to-day. To none can he impart the "peace of God which passeth all understanding," but to him who comes in faith. Peace in return for faith,—that is the offer of the Christian Church from that day to this.

To those who have this faith so strong that they think they can receive from Christianity the peace which shall calm their spiritual restlessness,—to those who think they can go to Jesus, accept his yoke, and receive "rest unto their souls,"—I can only say, in all sincerity and sympathy,—“In God's name go! For you I have no message. My word is to other ears. I bid you God-speed in your journey. But when you demand that all shall bow before your Master, and forbid me to utter my convictions to those who are not of his flock, shall I obey God or man? It is not a matter of choice with any one what he shall believe, or in what he shall put his faith. We think as we must, we believe as we can. The number of those who cannot feel that faith in the Christ which is the absolute condition of receiving spiritual rest and peace from him, is vast beyond the suspicion of any, and includes multitudes in the Christian Church itself. Are these to hear no hint of great truths which can meet their needs? The modern world is rapidly drifting away from its old moorings; and for many an earnest, troubled heart, no peace or rest is to be found in the Christian Church. To such I believe I have a word of faith higher than that in any Christ,—a gospel of free thought, free principles, free humanity,—which is to me worth infinitely more than the gospel of the Christian Church. Go, then, your way, and let me go mine! May we both bear rest to the restless, faith to the faithless, hope, truth, and love to the hungry hearts of men!"

In the story of the Deluge, although wholly worthless as history, I find a good illustration of important truth. According to this old myth, the Ark of Noah bore in safety its precious cargo of life, while the floods covered the face of the whole earth. At the end of the forty days, Noah sent forth the dove to learn if the water's had abated; but the dove, finding "no rest for the sole of her foot," returned once more to the shelter of the ark. A second time she was sent forth, and now returned with an olive-leaf in her mouth, showing that the tree-tops were uncovered by the subsiding floods. Sent out yet a third time, she found the waters gone, the woods and plains and hills and valleys rejoicing in their native beauty, and the disordered courses of Nature restored to perfect harmony. The ark, with its scanty shelter of human manufacture, was no longer needed; the broad earth lay on every side basking in the sun, and offered a safe home arched over by smiling skies; and the joyous dove, finding rest everywhere for the sole of her foot, returned to the ark no more.

Is there not, in this quaint and charming legend of ancient days, a true symbol of historic fact? The decaying civilization of the vast Roman Empire was swept away by a terrible inundation of barbarism from the North, which submerged in ruin the whole fabric of ancient society. During the long deluge of ignorance which is known as the Dark Ages, the Christian Church was the ark of safety for the best religion of the times and the germs of modern civilization. The monasteries, convents, and cloisters were the places of deposit for all that has come down to us of the wisdom of antiquity; and the careful education of ecclesiastics, and the opportunities for thought and study thus afforded in turbulent times, drew into those calm retreats the finest intellects of the period. The Christian Church was indeed, as is claimed, the ark that bore securely over the waters of social and intellectual chaos all that was sacred as the promise of a better era.

But in the course of time the floods of ignorance began to subside; inventions and discoveries followed the revival of ancient learning, and mankind entered on a new career of greatness. Then religion, like the dove, quitted the ancient ark of the Church in the Protestant Reformation, seeking rest for the sole of its foot; but, finding at that period no rest save in the infallibility of the Scriptures, it practically re-entered the ark, and sought again the shelter of historical Christianity. But the genius of modern times kept busily at work, and the floods still kept subsiding; until, in the Unitarian controversy of fifty years ago, religion again flew forth with brave pinions from the old ark, and explored a second time the surface of the earth. In the great principle of spiritual freedom, it surely plucked an olive-leaf, a promise of eventual enduring peace; but, finding still no rest save in the infallibility and Lordship of the Christ, it again re-entered the ark, and abode still in the Christian Church.

At last, in these most recent days, the dove—the spirit of religion reconciled to the spirit of the age—flies forth once more with outspread wings in the conscious self-emancipation of Free Religion. She finds that the floods are well-nigh gone, that the earth is all open to the radiant beams of illuminating knowledge, and that nowhere need she now seek in vain to find rest for the sole of her foot. The ark of the Christian Church, useful as it was during the long millenium of mediæval superstition, is fast aground between the twin peaks of Ararat; and, rejoicing like Noah's dove to find the earth everywhere a safe and happy home, religion claims no more the shelter of the ark, but flies forth to dwell henceforth beneath the open skies. The soul has come face to face with universal truth, and discovers that the rest she needs is the rest of living consciously at one with Nature in the immediate God, and of serving with great fidelity the great cause of universal human welfare.

To some of you, however, the dove sent out from the Christian ark to explore the floods seems still to find no rest for the sole of her foot. What I mean by finding peace without faith in the Christ, or by attaining true spiritual rest outside of Christianity, is to such persons at least unintelligible. They can comprehend no higher religion than that which is bound up with the person of Jesus; and any attempt to separate religion from Christianity seems to deal a deadly blow at both. They say,—“You have given up Christianity,—what have you kept? You have destroyed the old,—what is the new? You have taken away our idols, and what have we left? What shall feed our souls with high faith and conquering patience and divine love? Perhaps you are right that Christianity is false; but then, in the name of heaven, what is true?"

In vain should I strive to tell you, my friends, how profoundly this appeal probes my heart. I have dared to destroy,—am I able to reconstruct? Ought I not to have suppressed my convictions out of tenderness to those who must be wounded thereby? I can answer these questions but in one way,—the love of truth has constrained me to speak. Yet, if my eye beholds indeed effects in their causes, I say boldly, the good done by what I have said must exceed the evil. Some are wounded by speech,—others by silence, and most of all my own soul. I am not seeking to sap the true faith of any man,—God forbid! but to build it firmer and deeper and higher. But when you ask, what have I left in place of Christianity? I reply, religion, of which Christianity is but a transient and imperfect form. Nothing good and true in Christianity can in any wise be dropped by him who cleaves to religion. I have not called Christianity "false"; it is partly false and partly true; and the truth in it is religion.

Taken away your idols, and what have you left? Why, friends, the universe! Is not that enough? Can you not worship God without idols? If you have never veiled your face in utter awe before the Infinite Reality,—never lifted up your heart to the source of all existence, without form or body or feature that rash imagination may dare to picture forth,—never thrilled to your inmost being with a sense of that mysterious Life which the universe everywhere manifests to man,—you have yet to sound the depths of genuine adoration. If this ignoring of all idols, this recognition of the One as at once the origin and the goal of the All, this passionate thirst for God, to the utter forgetfulness of all Mediators, be not true worship, I know not what is. Every better feeling that comes over me fills me with awe as the rushing of the Absolute Goodness into my soul; every recoil from my lower self is the response of the Infinite Purity to my most earnest aspiration. Alas, my friends, if faith in the Viewless One, all-present, all-pure, all-loving, the power of life unto life in the soul of man, be unsubstantial and void unless coupled with I know not what historic name or fame, we are all of us idolaters. Perish all other thoughts, so the great thought of God survive to enrich our poor living and ignoble feeling! With awe that makes dumb the voluble tongue of human beggary, it makes us lay our hands upon our mouth, and highly resolve to quit us like men in the warfare of the world. If, from this inward fountain of self-dedication to the Divine, high faith and conquering patience, divine love and godlike courage are not born in our souls day by day and hour by hour, let us be ashamed to tease the Infinite One to grant us for the sake of another what he otherwise withholds. If he loves not to give, I will at least scorn to beg. Beware of ever letting worship degenerate into fawning sycophancy or selfish importunity. Let us have nothing to ask of God, but be true to him and to ourselves; and we shall then stand in as little need of Christianity as of witchcraft.

Religion is the harmony between our outward life and God's inward law. It concerns the integrity of our daily actions, the purity of our habitual feelings, the nobleness of our cherished purposes, the moral dignity of our motives, the self-sacrifice of our home-life, the unflinching fidelity to principle of our life in the midst of men. If religion is not constant aspiration and heroic endeavor in the light of universal ideas,—everlasting identification of our aims with the grandest thought we can form of the aims of God,—then it must drop out of human life as idle reverie or baleful superstition. The "faith in Christ" urged by all Christian Churches is broadening out in these earnest days like the mouth of the Amazon, and will yet further expand till it is lost as a drop in the great ocean of enthusiasm for humanity. Well says Emerson,—“We shall not always set so great a value on a few texts, on a few lives.” The best life is but a feeble outshadowing of the possibilities of Man, and the value of all lives (so far as the race is concerned) consists in the value of the principles they illustrate. Religion is more than Christianity, not less; and, instead of hingeing on the abnormal greatness of a single man, it has its basis in universal humanity. To faith in that, rather than to faith in the Christ, are we pointed by the living experience and most profound religion of to-day; and we first begin to comprehend the true greatness of Jesus himself, when we behold in him only an instance of human nature testifying to its own divine quality.

Dear friends, there is neither rest nor peace for the soul of man save in the sublime verities of religion thus realized. They shed over the whole of life a divine tenderness, a cheerful beauty; they breathe a spirit of ineffable repose into the human heart, tired and exhausted by the pettiness of facts. I have found myself hungering for more substantial truth and more self-centred faith than Christianity can yield; and in obedience to a natural instinct I have come to find my rest in universal and free religion. Not the Church, but the world, is henceforth my home; not Jesus, but God, is the "Life, Truth, and Way." Alas that so few can discern the transcendent sublimity of the larger faith,—that so many brand as infidelity the sincerest and deepest religion of the age!

Miscellaneous.

A LETTER TO THOSE WHO THINK.

[The following letter, printed in Worcester, Mass., in 1840, by Edward Palmer, is admirable. We are indebted for a copy of it to a friend in Philadelphia, who desires information concerning its author.]

To those who think, and who are favorable to freedom of thought and expression, one may state with candor and simplicity his honest and deliberate convictions; even though the narrow-minded call him a heretic, an infidel, and other hard names. It is no new or very strange thing for persons to be called infidels, and unbelievers, by those who have much less faith than themselves. The worst infidels are those who are false to the principles of justice and humanity; those who have so little faith in Man that they deny his capacity for self-government, and eternal progress. While I am conscious of not meriting the epithet infidel, I am willing to relinquish the name Christian, and am well satisfied with the simple appellation of Man. For, though it is no small matter to be a true Christian, I now see that it is much more to be a whole, a simple, and a true Man.

I am convinced that Christianity is to be superseded; as that has superseded Judaism. The human soul is outgrowing it; as it has previously outgrown other systems and technicalities. The principles and truths embraced in these will endure, as all that is true will endure, forever. But as Man progresses in the knowledge of the truth, he naturally and properly disencumbers himself of creeds and forms, and learns that he is not to live by recorded precedents, or upon the experience of others, but to go forth freely and spontaneously in obedience to his own pure instincts. He is not to be a follower of Moses, or Jesus, but to follow the light within him; to act in accordance with the promptings of his own moral nature; and thus be true to his own soul.

As from among the Jews came some of a more extended vision—afterwards called Christians—so from among Christians are coming a still more liberal and enlightened class, who will acknowledge no name but that of HUMANITY: no creed but UNIVERSAL TRUTH. Besides the good and true who have never been connected with the Christian church, some have come out, and others are coming out therefrom, who will no more go back again, or consent to wear her livery, or her name, than Protestants will go back to the Church of Rome; or Roman, Greek, and other Christians return again to the Jewish church.

A system which could be made to serve any tolerable purpose for nearly two thousand years, must indeed have embraced much truth. But even though it embraced all the fundamental principles upon which Man is to act through eternity, it must, as a system, pass away, or become a limit and a hindrance to Man's progress. There are passages in the New Testament—though obscured by others of a different character—which indicate the way through which we may be led into all truth; but it does not pretend, of itself, to instruct us upon many points and principles which are indispensable to our becoming whole and true Men. Truths and principles which are to be learned only from the BOOK OF NATURE, around and within us. One may be a true Christian, by simply having the heart or affections right. Whereas, to be a true Man, it is necessary that the mind should be well cultivated; and all the faculties of the soul and body in a state of improvement and healthful exercise. Christian perfection is attained when one becomes imbued with "perfect love," though many of the faculties of the mind and body are but imperfectly developed. But the true perfection of Humanity requires the cultivation and improvement of the whole Man; the symmetrical development and well-balanced exercise of his whole nature. Thus establishing, what has been denied by Christians and others, the entire divinity of Humanity.

As near as the facts can now be ascertained, it appears that Jesus was a pure-minded and simple Man, who, having by his purity and simplicity maintained his own moral freedom, aimed to free others from the shackles of tradition and ecclesiastical domination, by inducing them to be faithful and simple and true. It is not likely that he designed to establish any such class or party as that which is called Christian; and if he was now here in the material body, it is not probable that he would acknowledge them, or be acknowledged by them. Many of his wise and excellent sayings were evidently misunderstood, perverted and erroneously recorded. The principles which he inculcated were undoubtedly those pure and simple principles which have their foundation in Man's moral nature; and which have been recognized and admired by the wise and good in all ages and quarters of the world. The principles of true religion are natural and instinctive principles; immutably established in the moral constitution of Man. That principle, for instance, which forms the basis both of the Jewish and Christian systems—Love thy neighbor as thyself—Do by others as you would have others do by you—is an instinctive principle of Man's moral nature; just as naturally and really revealed to every moral being, who is in any degree cultivated, as it was to Moses, Confucius, or Jesus. It is naturally suggested to the mind and heart of every one of any reflection. And a true knowledge of our nature discovers to us the propriety and importance of regarding our neighbor as ourselves, as our neighbor is found to be an indissoluble part of ourselves. The moral law is the immutable law of Man's moral nature; and no one can violate it, or do wrong in any way, without doing violence to his own nature, and thus injuring himself.

The principle of self-sacrifice, or suffering for the right and true, even to the destruction of the body, is also an instinctive principle of Man's nature. The history of the world abounds with the manifestation of it, though it has been generally perverted, and exercised in subordination to other and lower instincts, which have led men most frequently to shed the blood of others at the same time that they poured out their own. But a true knowledge of our whole nature makes it obvious that this principle of self-sacrifice is designed to effect the ultimate deliverance of Man from all outward wrong; inasmuch as a proper development and full understanding of the philosophy of our nature clearly shows that the overcoming of evil with good is the true, natural, and only way to overcome it.

There are all sufficient moral as well as physical laws established in Man's nature; and he is endowed with intelligence to discover, and power to obey them. He needs but to know himself: to study, cultivate and exercise the noble nature with which he is endowed; a nature so noble and generous, and so consonant with all that is good and true, that nothing is wanted but its proper development, cultivation and exercise, to bring into harmony and beautiful order all that pertains to his interest and happiness as an individual and social being.

It is imposing upon the credulity of Man to talk of his being indebted to a recorded revelation for a knowledge of God and his own immortality, or of transmitting, by any means, this knowledge from one to another. It is only in accordance with his moral purity and moral cultivation that each can possess any satisfactory assurance of these great truths. It is only just in accordance with the conformity of himself to all the laws of his nature, that Man is conscious of his relation to a higher order of his existence. As his spiritual or moral, as well as intellectual and physical nature is developed, cultivated and exercised, so is he assured of the Spiritual and Eternal, of his own immortality and eternal identity. Recorded revelation, or the experience of others on these points, may sometimes be sources of satisfaction and encouragement; but as these are so much affected by the state of the minds through which they come, they more frequently serve but to bewilder and mislead.

Both the Old and the New Testaments contain much that is true and beautiful and good, as well as some error, superstition, and pious fraud. The beauties and excellencies of the Bible will undoubtedly be recognized, acknowledged and admired by ages yet unborn. It is a book of ancient history and poetry, which should be read with discrimination, as should all other books. It abounds with allegory, high-wrought imagery, and hyperbole. It shadows forth some of the most important truths, and narrates some of the most deep and devoted religious experience. But the book is not to be worshipped, nor regarded as the fountain of truth. For truth is above and independent of all books; and is at best but poorly recorded upon paper. Almost all nations of people have some records of it, which they come to regard with great veneration, as essential to the very existence of truth. And this is the evil. Men are led to look to a book, instead of looking into their own souls for the light of truth. They hold on to the book, and deny the present inspiration of truth; contend stoutly for an imperfect record of its revelations to others in past ages, and reject the present living word. They thus become so blinded as to deny that each has a standard in himself by which to judge and determine the truth or falsity of what is written; lose sight of the all-important fact that each and all are inspired by the same infinite spirit of truth, and have free access to the same illimitable fountain.

The prevailing view of miraculous power, and its manifestations, as derived from the Bible, and held by Christians, tends much to blind and mislead men, and distort their understanding of the truth. As there have been many that were called gods, and yet there is but one true God, so among all the wonders that have been called miracles, there never was but one that is true; and that is all-pervading and eternal; without beginning and without end. All around us and within us, is full of miracle. The earth, the ocean, and the air; every tree, and plant, and flower, and spire of grass, with all the works of nature and of art, are parts of that stupendous miracle which comprises Man himself; the most miraculous of all the manifestations of the Deity. But the excessive lovers of the marvellous have ascribed to the pure and noble-minded Jesus, as miraculous works, such feats as conjurors perform. Self-evident and simple truth commends itself to the mind and heart of Man without factitious aid. Such false and perverted views of miracle—which have abounded in the darker ages of the world—serve only to disaffect the more enlightened, as they do to obscure and blind the minds of the credulous and uncultivated, to the true and continual agency and manifestation of God. It is not at all probable that Jesus inculcated any such false and mistaken views. It is more probable that his very endeavors to correct such narrow and erroneous views, and to lead his friends to see the true miracle, which is every where and perpetual, was misunderstood and misrepresented through their overweening superstition. He might have spoken, in the figurative language of the time, of removing mountains of difficulty, and of raising to moral life those who were dead and buried in the graves of ignorance and vice. Some remarkable cases of the literal recovery of the sick might have occurred, through the power of excited imagination, which does sometimes work wonders on the bodily organs. Some of the morally blind were undoubtedly made to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk. And everything relating to the whole matter, as it was reported among the credulous, was undoubtedly distorted and magnified to suit the perverted tastes of the lovers of the marvellous. If he spoke to the multitude upon the mountain so interestingly that their natural hunger was for the time allayed, though they had for that purpose only a few loaves and fishes, it would be sufficient to make a story of the literal feeding of thousands, and an abundance of food being left. If he spoke of living and triumphing, even after the destruction of his body—as I have no doubt that he did, and still lives, with all others who, before or since, have passed the same stage of their existence, though not apprehended by our grosser senses—how easily, in that age of marvellousness and gross superstition, would the story soon get abroad after his crucifixion, that he was actually seen with the material organs! And in a recorded account of all this, written some half a century afterwards, what can be expected but a false and perverted version of the whole matter?

The present popular worship, as practised by Christians, and to which we are trained from our childhood, is gross and unsatisfactory, and almost idolatrous. People go now, as did the Jews of old, to one or another, and almost all to some place to worship. I have no objection to hearing a dissertation or discourse on any important subject, if the speaker understands it, and really have something to say, though I am not pleased to hear old thoughts too often repeated. I love to hear good music. For I am charmed with the melody of the human voice and the sweet sounds of the well-tuned instruments, as well as the music of birds and groves and brooks. But I cannot now see the need of going to any particular place to worship. I cannot any longer be satisfied with the worship of a deity which is approached only through some prescribed mode or medium. I have lost all interest in that kind of worship which depends upon place, form or position. The only worship which seems to me of any importance is that which consists in devotion to principle; love of truth; regard for the right; reverence for the pure and perfect, the sublime and beautiful and good. This is a kind of worship which we can enjoy at all times and places, for it is in accordance with the highest instincts of our nature. God is really worshipped and honored only when Man is faithful to his best and highest thought; only as he is true to his noblest and most perfect idea.

A change is evidently needed in all the systems of moral or religious, as well as mental and physical cultivation. We need something less formal and ceremonious, which will enable men to come nearer together, and enjoy a more full, free and perfect interchange of thought and feeling and social intercourse with each other. They need to be delivered from their present excessive regard for the local and the outward, and their misplaced confidence in the power of numbers, and to feel and realize more fully the power of principle, the omnipotence of truth, as manifested in the individual.

Nothing can now serve Man only as it leads him to the study and understanding of himself; the cultivation and exercise of his whole nature; the conformity of himself to the pure and simple laws of his being; and thus, in truth and simplicity, introduces him to the great SCHOOL OF NATURE, with all its beauty and loveliness and glory, where he may lose the narrow and depressing thought of himself and his infirmities in the delightful lessons to be learned as a pleasure and not as a task.

The customs, usages, exclusive interests and institutions of the present day—linked and dove-tailed together as they are—partake too much of the spirit of the ages that are past. They have served their purpose, and must pass away. As, in the course of human progress, higher and holier principles of Man's nature are developed, an order of things is called for more in accordance with his advanced and advancing condition. The existing institutions must give place to something more natural and social, more simple and true; something better adapted to the cultivation of the whole human nature; more consistent with individual liberty, fraternal regard, and the whole interest of Humanity. Most of them are now hindrances to human progress; some of them are clogs and fetters upon the soul of Man, which must, and ere long will be, removed.

The genial rays of the light of truth are melting away the last strong-holds of error and oppression; and Man is inspired with hope, as he is encouraged to investigate, and permitted to think. The divine spirit which induces improvement and progress and change is bringing many to see, by a proper understanding of our whole nature, that the cumbersome and burdensome machinery of an outward civil government—with all its abuses and abominations—may be safely and profitably dispensed with; as the only true and immutable Laws are found to be those established in the nature and constitution of every individual; and true SELF-government to consist in the free and voluntary conformity of each to these Laws without reference to any other.

The present property system—perverting, as it does, the laudable desire of Man to improve his condition, into a narrow, sordid selfishness, and almost compelling him to violate some or all of the laws of his nature—will soon be seen to be the principal source of the crime and wretchedness which prevails, and the obvious interest of all, if no higher motive, will lead to a material change in relation to it. The benevolent and fraternal must take the place of the selfish and exclusive principle upon which the intercourse and business of Men is now conducted; and thus, if not a community of property, have a true community of interest; bringing into unity the clashing interests of the many, and superseding the faith-destroying and soul-perverting practice of giving and requiring bonds, notes, and metal pledges, at every turn, as though no Man could confide in his fellow Man; precluding the confidence and love which would otherwise naturally exist, by continually forbidding its exercise, and enabling some to command the continual service of others without rendering any actual service in return. As no one can be a true or a free Man while he is the hand or instrument of another, each must have a portion of the soil and the means of improving it for himself; that each may enjoy the privilege of directing his own physical energies by the powers and energies of his own mind, and no one be compelled to work in any other way than with his head and heart and hands at the same time. Then will manual, as all other effort, be manly and graceful to Man; and no more be required of either than what is consistent with the improvement and happiness of all.

In a false and perverted condition of society there is dread of every innovation or change. But a practical knowledge of the truth promotes confidence and freedom and strength to advance. And as advancement is made in the knowledge of the truth, there is found to be a fitness and harmony in all that pertains to the moral as well as the material world, which gives assurance that whatever is true is always expedient and safe. Truth is Man's moral aliment; and liberty his natural element. Progress is an eternal law of his nature; and there is an infinitude of room for improvement and progress before him. His nature is as unlimited and boundless as eternity; its resources as inexhaustible as the fountain of truth.

Moreover, in view of the wrongs and temporary evils to which we are subject, it is joyous to know that there is an infinite spirit of renovation in the world and within us. All nature is omnipotently restorative and renewing. God reigns. Truth always triumphs. Let us be encouraged and rejoice.

EDWARD PALMER.

A HOPE OF SAND.

[From Zion's Herald.]

Prof. Everett, at the annual Commencement of the Harvard Divinity School, tied the rope around all the conservative and infidel Unitarians. If one goes over the precipice, all must. He said:—

"Of one thing we are sure: However we talk of conservative or radical Unitarianism, we are one brotherhood. We have our differences, but we are all heretics, outside the pale of all Evangelical Christendom. These different sects could not be consistent, and not bar us out. No one of us, however radical he may be, but that has got truth enough to save the world. A few great truths unite us—faith in the power of God, and faith in human nature, faith in the faculties of the human soul."

This concession that Mr. Potter, or Abbot, or Frothingham, or Johnson, or Wasson, or Collyer, has truth enough to save the world, is naturally followed by a statement of their creed; for much as they deny they have one, they are always uttering one. In his faith there is no divine Christ, no recognition of sin or of the need of a Savior, no authentic and authoritative Word of God, no peculiar Christian doctrine; faith in God being a common property of human nature; Indian, Afric, Arab and Asiatic, all accepting that article of faith. But if all their radical ring, from Parker to Abbot, are of this household of faith, few of their Christian side will long abide in their communion. The change is inevitable. Let it come.

[The above statement of Prof. Everett does not cover, and probably was not intended to cover, the editor of THE INDEX. It is not fair to the Unitarians to make them responsible for him; and Zion's Herald will doubtless avoid this misrepresentation in future. —ED.]

"Is Mr. G— good?" said a bank officer to a director. "That depends whether you mean Godward or manward," was the answer. "Explain," said the bank officer. "Godward, Mr. G— is good; no man in our church is sounder in the faith, prays often in our meetings, or is more benevolent apparently; but manward, I am sorry to say, Mr. G— is rather tricky."

An English clergyman lately thanked, from the pulpit, two courageous members of his congregation, who had waited on him to protest—one against the "rapid utterances" of the reverend gentleman, and the other against the "dreary, long sermons." So far from being offended at these friendly remonstrances, the preacher politely expressed his desire to profit by them.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"The thought of writing to you was suggested after reading some extracts from your pen, quoted in the N. Y. Christian Advocate of the 31st March.

He is better prepared to reject Christ altogether, who has first rejected his divinity.

The purpose of this letter is to persuade you to examine again the claims of Jesus to divinity; committing yourself to God with a sincere desire to know only the truth. Your own salvation, and the good which might be accomplished through your instrumentality on this point of doctrine, if convinced of its truth, are imperative reasons for this effort. It is written,—'he that is not for me is against me, and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad.'

Allow me to suggest a proposition which, if sustained, includes this doctrine. The end of man's salvation is the impartation of divinity.

Peter, speaking of the promises of God through Christ, says,—'that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature.'

'It pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell.'

'Whom He did foreknow, them He did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son.'

Those who are conformed to his image have it directly imparted in a limited degree, but to the fulness of their capacity.

If these thoughts are sufficiently interesting to lead you, not to argue, but to compare thoughts, I shall gladly consent, praying that God by His Holy Spirit may lead you into all truth."

—"I am so much pleased with THE INDEX that I cannot forbear snatching a fragment of time from my laborious duties to give you a word of encouragement. I am greatly pleased with Mr. Herndon's article; it is not a labored, scholarly effort, but it bears the impress of truth and cannot fail to attract much attention. Mr. H. is a brave soul to thus beard the orthodox lion and snatch from his keeping the fame of this great and true man. I am particularly pleased also with your reply to the Truth Association. In that I find a reflection of my own mind and sentiments as clear as I see my face in a plate glass mirror. You there take precisely the position I have occupied for years, and, standing as I have almost alone, it is refreshing and cheering to find a soul so akin to my own in its thoughts and aspirations. I have long held that religious societies should establish no test of membership, either of belief or moral excellence, for the reason that these are controlled by congenital and educational conditions largely, if not solely, and if imperfect are not likely to be corrected by a policy that excludes the victims of ignorance and vice from the society of the wise and virtuous. You very justly remark that those who have no wish to grow better will give a free religious society a wide berth. And who so beastly selfish as to spurn association with a repentant sinner, a fallen brother or sister who expresses by word or act a desire, however faint, to live a better life and reach a higher plane of development?"

—"I have all the numbers to this date and wish to keep on taking them. If the enclosed is not sufficient for the rest of this year's subscription, please inform me and I will remit the balance. I am glad to see THE INDEX a success, and am much pleased with it. Hoping success may crown all your efforts and that you may live long to edit THE INDEX, etc."

A promising student of one of the western colleges, consulting with his Professor as to his studies to be pursued, thought he would not take prayers, as he had taken them the preceding term.

Poetry.

THIRTY-NINE.

I.

The lilac-scented breath of June
Is through my window stealing;
One silver thread the growing moon
Is faintly now revealing.

The odorous breath my curtain lifts,
It stirs, too, deeps of feeling,
As I look o'er my birth-day gifts,
By the low casement kneeling,—

Kneeling in mood of thankfulness;
It is not quite like praying,
But God will hear it none the less,
Although no words I'm saying:

Because I bless with grateful tears
The Power that, wise and loving,
Through all these sad, mysterious years,
His goodness has been proving.

Will they to Him less grateful prove
Than words of glad rejoicing,
Loud thanks of gratitude and love
That happier lips are voicing?

Ah, no! He knows why fall these tears,
As memory is drifting
Back on the ebbing tide of years,
Whose every wave, uplifting

A turbid crest of grief or pain,
Breaks in a surf of wailing;
Would my tossed boat have reached this main,
Had all been summer sailing?

II.

The birthdays of my childhood I
Am tenderly recalling,
And those of youth, when hope was high—
And did not dream of falling.

The lilac's fragrant breath is now
To recollection bringing
One day so bright I wondered how
The world could keep from singing!

Alas! I learned but too soon why
So many hearts are aching;
Stern disappointment, striding by,
Gives each a rough awaking.

III.

The gifts of friendship and of love
Down the drear past are going;
But better gifts the God above
On me is now bestowing,—

A boundless trust that tempers hope;
A faith, deep and abiding;
A love that finds its largest scope
In praise, and spares the chiding.

This best gift of the golden three
He let me gain through sinning,
A true and tender charity—
It is well worth the winning!

By my own pain and sin and strife
My neighbor's grief I'm guessing,
And through the lessons of my life
I'd turn it into blessing.

And now no more his joy to me
Brings envious repining;
I long in every face to see
A blissful radiance shining.

There's one great gift I fain would seek,—
A brave and calm enduring
Of daily frets with spirit meek,
Thus God's own peace securing.

So, through the tears that still will fall,
Glad thanks my heart is raising;
Come good or ill, to Him for all
I give sincerest praising.

IV.

As midway now in life I stand,
The downward slope descending,
I gladly grasp the Loving Hand
That all my way is tending.

And when I reach, at last, the end,
And quietly am lying,
I, trusting still my life-long Friend,
Shall find how good is dying.

O summer breath! thy rich perfume
That, through the calm night stealing,
Comes fraught with power to lift my gloom,
I bless thy sweet, sweet healing!

O best of Friends! these tokens kind
That Thou to me art giving Teach me to use, that I may find
The truest way of living!

CONSISTENCY.

"Consistency," says Mr. Emerson, "is the hobgoblin of little minds."

Nothing could be more true than this oft-quoted saying, if by "consistency" is understood that stupidity which always adheres to a precedent established by itself. He who refuses to right a wrong or confess an error through fear of "inconsistency"—he who is so mulishly obstinate as to stick to a foolish course, lest it be said that he has "changed his mind,"—is indeed scared by a ghost.

But in a higher sense consistency is indeed a "jewel." The learner is always unlearning,—always abandoning his own crudities and follies as fast as he discerns their character. He who so loves reality that he has no leisure to love his own mistakes, but rather glows with delight before a newly revealed verity, and straightway makes it the rule of his conduct, is "consistent" in the love of truth and goodness, and could ill spare that instinct which bids him match the ideal with the real. It is indeed poor business to be everlastingly glancing back at our own "record," that we may fashion to-day after the pattern of yesterday. But it is the hero's task to shape to-day into the likeness of that to-morrow of which he dreams. This is "consistency" indeed,—the harmonizing of fact with aspiration and action with high principle,—the grand unity of a life ordered by law.

The most striking feature of the controversy on the question—"Was Dickens a Christian?"—is the fact that the world laughs at it. There was a time when no more grave or momentous question could have been asked. Now nobody cares, except a few "old maids of both sexes." It is enough to know that Dickens had a heart overflowing with human sympathies, full of pity for the misery he described, and quietly but mightily in earnest to alleviate it. It would be impossible to determine the exact amount of his influence in fostering the humanitarian, democratic spirit of the nineteenth century; but it was immense. Who has so beautifully touched with light the goodness that walks in lowly garb, or caused so many hearts to throb with a new-born love for man? The Christianity that Dickens knew not has passed away from the reverence of the age. A rainbow is stereotyped upon the skies that canopy his dust.

The "Little Corporal," an excellent monthly for children, comes to us this month much improved in appearance. It is now about as large as "Our Young Folks," and some little people of our acquaintance enjoy it about as much. The stories and illustrations are alike good; and we wish all success to the "Little Corporal." Published for only one dollar a year, by Sewell & Miller, Chicago, Ill.

A USEFUL BOOK.

Dr. John Cowan's "Science of a New Life" is a work devoted to all that relates to marriage, and written in a style and spirit that command our unqualified approbation. It is plain, direct, and practical,—yet permeated with so deep a reverence for the marriage relation and so utter an abhorrence of what we are ashamed to call fashionable abominations, that pruriency will be rebuked and the love of purity heightened by its perusal. There can be no question that physiological knowledge of this character is sorely needed by thousands and thousands of people, whose innocent offspring must pay the penalty of their parents' ignorance or vice. To those who would put a really unexceptionable book on these subjects in the hands of young persons approaching maturity, we can conscientiously recommend this as one that will enlighten without debasing. We are sorry that confidence in the wise and pure counsels of Dr. Cowan must run some risk of being diminished by certain erratic suggestions (e. g. that of selecting a consort by comparison of phrenological charts, and that of securing one by advertising as a last resort), which do not really detract from the substantial value of the book. Some of his theories we by no means accept; but none the less do we heartily commend his volume as one of the very best of its class. Octavo, tinted paper, 402 pages: published by Cowan & Company, 746 Broadway, New York.

We have received the first number (July, 1870) of The American Scientific Monthly, edited and published by Prof. Gustavus Hinrichs at Iowa City, Iowa. It will appear on the first of each month, and contain thirty-two pages, devoted to popular or general science, science for schools, reviews of new scientific books, biographical sketches of eminent men of science, descriptions of scientific establishments, and original contributions to science. Six numbers will constitute a volume, and the first volume (from July to December inclusive) is guaranteed. Terms, $1.00 per volume, in advance.

The first number is exceedingly good, and promises well for the future. It contains several very interesting articles, simply and clearly written; especially one on "Fashionable Poisons," which gives the percentage of metallic lead contained in fifteen popular Hair Restoratives, varying from .11 to 16.39 grains. Other interesting articles are copied or translated from the best foreign scientific periodicals, or contributed from original sources. We trust that this useful magazine will find a generous reception with the public.

The "letter of Cotton Mather," first published by the Easton (Pa.) Argus, narrating the scheme for the capture of William Penn and his sale as a slave at Barbadoes, turns out, as we suspected it would turn out, to be an impudent hoax. Our scepticism as to the genuineness of the document prevented our reprinting it at the time. The political malice which was so clearly the root of the forgery needs no comment—it is beneath contempt.

Rev. Alexander Clark has an article in the Independent entitled—"Brigham in Utah." There is more in the title than there is in the article.

DISCIPLESHIP.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, June 29, 1870.

ED. INDEX:

Sir,—You are doing noble work in a noble way, in assailing certain baneful chimeras, and emphasizing the importance of the higher intuitions. You may, hereafter, believe that you and I, and all men, need to have those intuitions translated into such a life, and into such words, as Jesus furnished to groping, purblind humanity. It may be that you justify your renouncement of the Christian name, in view of one of its transient and obsolete significations. It may be that you have an unwarrantable fear of the galling and cramping effect of "discipleship." Are we not all of necessity disciples of Nature, Art and Science?

I am, Sir, truly yours,

D.

[Most assuredly we are, if we do not prove faithless to ourselves. Yet discipleship to "Nature, Art and Science" is not discipleship to a person, unless the person is himself all these.—Ed.]

VERDIGRIS.

[The following extract from a private letter, written from a New England country-town, has been handed to us for publication. The article referred to has already been printed in THE INDEX, No. 25.—Ed.]

The Watchman and Reflector published a notice of the meetings of the Free Religious Association,—an article of nearly two columns from a Baptist Rev. 'Twas bitter! I read it, and thought charitably (?) of Christian charity and brotherly love.

On Sunday, A. M., our minister, Rev. Mr. M. (Baptist), took for his text,—“And they laughed him to scorn.” He talked a little, giving us his definition of “religious verdigris,” very charitably applying it to skeptics and scoffers, who build themselves up by telling untruths about the Christian Church and trying to tear it to pieces. He then proceeded to read the afore-mentioned article, commenting and spitting out venom—no, verdigris, applying his own term; and such an outpouring of scorn and contempt I certainly NEVER heard! He emphasized particularly and so malignantly the unjust criticism upon Mr. Abbot.

I considered the entire thing a personal assault, as I had previously told him what I expected to enjoy in Boston at the Free Religious meeting; and he was afterward informed that I carried out my plans and enjoyed a “feast of reason.”

A “MISTAKE OF CHRIST.”

JUNE 19, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—

The Watchman and Reflector says: “Christ mistaken! think of it; will the clerical radical who thus dishonors his race and his God, please specify some mistake of Christ?”

Although not a clerical radical, I would say a few words, not, however, in defence of the clerical radical alluded to, as I presume he is amply able to defend himself, if need be. If the writer of the paragraph in the Watchman and Reflector will take the trouble of looking through the 21st chapter of Luke, he will find the following verses:

“25. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring.”

“26. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken.”

“27. And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory.”

“32. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled.”

Upwards of fifty generations have come and gone, and these things have not been fulfilled yet. No Christ has come in the clouds with power and glory and all the company of heaven. If this saying of Christ has not been demonstrated a mistake, by the history of more than eighteen hundred years, where can we look for a mistake?

THEISM AND ATHEISM.

TITUSVILLE, PA., June 12, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

My much esteemed friend,—I thank you very much for the kindness with which you responded to my letter of March 8, the fairness with which you commented on my exceptions to your doctrines, and the courtesy with which you invite me to “further explanations.” It becomes really a pleasure to argue a subject when, no matter what the difference between the parties, each is but animated by the friendliest feelings, ready to examine the other's arguments cautiously and impartially, and willing to judge of them only by their weight and merit. With these sentiments, my dear friend, I will proceed to give you some further explanations in defence of my last arguments.

After reading your friendly reply I find that the differences in our opinions are, after all, not so great as I apprehended; and that they can be reduced to the definition of but one single small word—the word “Power.” But in the definition we vary so essentially that it is, at once, the cause and explanation of the considerable divergence in our ideas of “God.” You say: “We ‘adopt’ nobody's idea of God, having one of our own. Neither Spinoza nor Herbert Spencer has adequately expressed it.” Very true, Sir; I can perfectly agree with you on that point, and maintain even that not only you, but every man, certainly every thinking man, has “an idea of his own” respecting God. I do not think, therefore, that you are warranted to say, “Mr. Einstein agrees with Mr. Spencer that ‘the Power which the Universe manifests is utterly inscrutable.’” I do not agree thus with Mr. Spencer, and cited his words merely as bearing on the inscrutability of the cause of the manifestations of the Universe, whatever that cause may be, without acknowledging either his “Power” or your “God” as that cause; for I am as skeptical as to his “Power” (Cause), as I am as to your “God.” The “manifestations” themselves are so obtrusive that no one in his sound senses could be skeptical on that point; there can, then, be no controversy as to their reality (existence), but very much as to their cause or causes,—as to a “First Cause,” “Power,” or “God.” For the cause only is “inscrutable,” and that only can be questioned. Hence it seems to me that you are a little too hasty, and not sustained in your convictions.—The supposition that it manifests itself destroys the supposition that it is utterly inscrutable.” For this supposition can not be thus destroyed ere it first be settled,—who or what is manifested in the Universe? Mr. Spencer says, “an inscrutable Power”; you say, “God.” But experience, science, and a true philosophy say, neither of the two—nothing but a Force or Forces, a Law or Laws which science has not yet been able to scrutinize, and which, according to Mr. Spencer, can not be fully scrutinized. The main difference, then, between you and Mr. Spencer's views—for they are, in the main, identical—and my own views and ideas is that both of you attribute intelligence to your “Power” or “God,” while I deny it (or rather experience, science and a true philosophy, which I take as guide, deny it) to my “Force or Law”; so that our whole difference will be reduced, as I stated above, to a definition of the term “Power,” as used in Mr. Spencer's explanation in question. You and Mr. Spencer believe, then, the cause of the “manifestations in the Universe” to be “an intelligent Power,” while I believe it to be but a great law or force, unintelligent and acting by spontaneity. This is perfectly satisfactory, and as clear to me as this subtle matter at all events can be.

One less philosophical than you might, perhaps, ask me,—“And wherefrom these laws?”—which you well know I could not answer. But then you could give me no better answer if in turn I should ask you, “And whence your God?” Nor could Mr. Spencer, if I should ask him, “And whence your Power?” This law, however, once established, leaves no “mystery” any more; everything henceforth becomes clear; all the “manifestations in the Universe” are but the inevitable consequences of this law of Nature, even though science might not be able to explain it in all cases. While in attributing intelligence to this “Power,” in adopting the idea of an intelligent “God,” we have not only the same unanswerable question as to the origin of this “Power” or “God,” but, when adopted, confusing and unanswerable questions. If there is much complaint of physical and moral evils, &c., we may console ourselves with thinking that they are but necessary consequences of some natural law or causes, known or unknown, may endeavor to find out the cause, if unknown, and thus remedy the evil. But if there is a Supreme Intelligence, “Power,” or “God,” that causes these and other evils because it pleases him to send them, we may well despair of remedying the evils we complain of; we can not hope, and therefore must not endeavor, to remedy them; progress, reforms and improvements become follies, and the best energies of the best men nonsense. With great esteem,

Truly yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

[We are very glad to publish this fair and in all respects unexceptionable statement of convictions which the church condemns as “impious,” but which are entitled to as much respect as its or our own. If we were in error in representing Mr. Einstein as “agreeing with Mr. Spencer,” it was because he himself used that very expression in his first letter, as he will see by referring to the close of his second paragraph.

Mr. Spencer would not, we think, admit that the “Power” he believes in is “intelligent,” since this is one of the predications which he disallows. In this respect we differ widely from him.

To deny the intelligence of the Universal Force of Nature because apparent defects exist in a system which as a whole is wonderfully harmonious, seems to us, we must confess, like attributing the works of Shakespeare to an unintelligent cause on account of a few misprints. Is it not philosophical to credit the apparent defects to our own confessedly imperfect knowledge of Nature?—Ed.]

THE INTELLIGIBILITY OF NATURE.

WARE, MASS., July 10, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Will you please (if you have them) forward to my address at—Ware, Mass., all the back numbers of THE INDEX up to No. 22, since which time I have been a subscriber? I will remit pay for them on receipt.

I like your paper very much. Not that all its ideas agree with my own at present (else I should hardly need it); but because I see that you have no pet theories to maintain, but seem to be guided by a candid desire to search for the Truth, regardless of the conclusions to which it may lead.

I have taken special interest in the letter of Morris Einstein, Esq., and your reply in No. 24. Your article in No. 10 on “The Miracle Question” I did not read, as I've not as yet seen it; but, if I understand you, I must in part agree with Mr. Einstein. Although I do not with him assert that the “Power which the universe manifests is utterly inscrutable,” yet I cannot clearly see that the harmony and invariability of action in Nature demonstrates an intelligent power controlling it, any more than I can see that this Divine Intelligence is caused and controlled by something still higher and wholly incomprehensible. I do not say that there is no Absolute Intelligent Power, but ask, with Mr. Einstein, can I know that there is? It seems to me that, if there is, it must be the causation of Nature's Laws, consequently with power to alter or set aside, therefore higher and superior to Nature, therefore God. Consequently does it not follow that there is some “other agent” than Nature? Else how is Atheism possible? Admitting Nature or her Laws to be God, who could say, “There is no God?” or “I believe there is no God?”

Respectfully yours,

[What is the difference between a heap of type piled up at random, and the same type when set up for printing our correspondent's excellent article? Briefly, the type can be read in one case, and not in the other. In the one case, therefore, we assume no intelligence as the cause of the arrangement, and in the other case we do. The intelligibility of the arrangement of the type in the latter case compels us to attribute it to intelligence. Does it not?

Precisely so with Nature. So long as it is not understood, it gives no hint of an intelligent cause. But so soon as it becomes intelligible, through the discovery of the unity of law, it becomes at once the expression of thought. The more absolute the harmony, the more clear the intelligence displayed. Nature, when interpreted to us by science, is as much an intelligible sign as a printed volume. The mind of the reader meets the mind of the author in every line; and we could as soon believe that Wilhelm Meister or the Iliad had no author, as believe that the intelligible system of Nature had no intelligent cause. Whether this cause could have adopted a different system or not, we cannot tell and do not care; it is enough for us that Nature is a system unchangeably adhered to,—therefore without miracle. Atheism we understand to be the denial that the omnipresent Power in (not above) Nature is intelligent. This is certainly possible.—Ed.]

CRITICISMS.

OLATHE, Kansas, July 4, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT,—I have just finished O. B. Frothingham's “Religion—what it is and what it is for,” and Wasson's “Review of Abbot's Religion;” and some ideas have been suggested to me which I would like to send you for the sake of truth, whose guidance we are resolved to follow wherever it may lead.

Frothingham evidently treats of the theologies and various forms of Religion, rather than of Religion in the abstract, or absolute Religion; while Wasson treats of it in the abstract mostly.

That religious teachers have associated with the worship of the Deity the moral duties of self-denial, love, fellowship and devotion to ideal objects, cannot be denied. All the religions of the present day do this more or less, making the performance of such duties a condition of acceptance with the Deity, whether performed by the individual or by proxy—by a vicarious mediator. But that Religion in the abstract is necessarily associated with these moral duties cannot be shown, I think. That they may exist without God-worship is a fact of history as well as of present experience, many individuals believing in the first who do not believe in the last.

If we mean by “Religion” to include these moralities, then it may be truly said that all persons professing religion have made it a point to perfect themselves in those duties; and in this sense it may be said—“Religion is man's effort to perfect himself.”

But Frothingham says further—“certain religions are adapted to certain stages of development, and no religion is adapted to all.” The rationalist, looking at the Deity through his laws; the Catholic, a willing subject of Church authority, not daring to look beyond his priest; and the Protestant, fully relying on the mediatorial office of his Christ,—have each a different attitude of worship; and what matters the form of worship, if it does not deny the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and does not take away individual responsibility? But this is just what some religions (theologies) do; and here is the weak point of “Free Religion.” Admit that one form of religion is adapted to me, and another to the Catholic, am I to surrender my particular views because they do not suit him, or vice versa? How could a “free religious” society of Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, &c., exist, without each denying his individual convictions?

Is not Religion, just like Benevolence, an instinctive sentiment—both equally needing the guidance of Reason? Some are blindly benevolent, and do more harm than good to the objects of their charity. So some religions, aiming to elevate man, to "perfect" him, have really a directly opposite effect, cramping his soul, making him a slave to priestcraft, and keeping him in the darkest ignorance. Instead of free benevolence and free religion, would it not indicate our meaning better to advocate rational benevolence and rational religion?

Respectfully yours,

J. E. S.

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL DEITY.

One of the best examples of design in nature is furnished by embryonic life. I shall assume the following hypothesis—that the agents in the process are the sperm-cells and the germ-cells; that these cells remember the whole life of the parents; and that this memory constitutes the design according to which they act. They reproduce the embryonic life of the parents, but modify it to some degree in accordance with the post-natal life of the models. This last supposition accommodates the hypothesis to the theory of evolution.

The accuracy with which the models are copied is marvellous; but it is a stupid accuracy, reproducing every flaw in the model. As the agents are blind followers of precedent, they of course settle all disagreements by compromises.

Let us now consider the ethics of this matter. We can not blame these agents for these flaws; but why does not the supreme being that employs these blind copyists interfere and stop this flaw-copying? The only reason that can be given that exculpates the supreme being is that it is not able to do so, but would if it could.

There is no good reason for supposing that to be a supernaturally omnipotent being which could, but will not. It has become a commonplace in scientific theory that God acts by subordinate agents. The Hindu philosopher, also, who wrote the following lines seems to say this:—"Two birds (God and the soul) reside unitedly in one tree. One of them eats the variously-tasted fruits, but the other quietly beholds all."

The Semitic religions have all adopted the theory that all things happen by the will of a supernaturally omnipotent being and as an inevitable consequence have made him out to be an immoral being. Some of their most logical reasoners will only admit that he is good to some, not all, of his own.

If you say that our finite ideas of ethics cannot measure the morality of an infinite being, how will you answer the Catholic, who uses a similar argument for the infallibility of the Pope?

But there is no need of accepting theories of the supreme being that make it to be an omnipotent Jesuit. To free ourselves from such conclusions, however, we must entirely throw off our adherence to Semitic religions.

THE INNER LIGHT.

"IF A MAN DIE, SHALL HE LIVE AGAIN?"

Vainly we con the page of cultured Greek or scholarly Hebrew for an answer to this question. Neither Pagan philosopher nor believing Jew nor the lore of all the ages can help us to its solution. In this, the simplest and most unlettered is as wise as the sages and savans. We may grope amid the rubbish of centuries—we may ask the brazen idols of antiquity—and question the marble gods of Greece and Rome; we may peer into the mysteries of Druidical shrines, and explore the temples of the Incas. The silence of the ages sleeps on ruined fane and broken tower. The idols mock our quest with their starry, inexorable gaze; and we raise our iconoclastic hammer, and shiver them to atoms. We can learn nothing from these stocks and stones.

We turn from these to Christendom, and strive to forget the blood and tears, and woes and wrongs, of eighteen centuries,—the persecution and intolerance that fed the fires of the Inquisition,—the fanaticism of the Crusades and their terrible traditions. We find many of the fetters of the Dark Ages on the limbs of the Nineteenth Century, many of the creeds of barbaric times engrafted on modern theology. Must we cleave forever to these, and accept sin as our birth-right, and total depravity as the portion of all the born and unborn millions? Must the lurid flames of an Orthodox Hell burn forever in the foreground of Christian belief? The dogma of the necessity of an Atonement has been a costly one to the world. It has been paid for in blood over and over again. Enlightened by this age, and saddened by the inconsistencies of Christians, ancient and modern, our reason and our affections forbid us to bow before these altars built on falsehood and stained with blood.

So we leave Christianity and her altars, even as we have left the broken idols of pagan superstition. The heavy gloom of her churches and cathedrals shuts us from the light of God. For God—not Christ,—must ever be the central truth of all religion. So at last we turn to the Inner Light. He has given us all; and by the flame of this never-dying revelation, the true intuitions of our own souls, we learn to read ourselves and to trust to the higher promptings and inspirations of our own spirits. Believing these to be a part of the great Father, eternal, progressive, and ever growing toward the grand truths of the eternal future, we accept the sacred teachings of this inner consciousness, and believe—"If a man die, he shall live again."

Ah, how many men and women have wrought out this experience,—have wept, and hoped, and prayed, and at last been crowned by this revelation!

Sweetly, after such a struggle, does the vast Spirit of the Universe respond to us. Never before could we wring from the great heart of Nature solace for this hidden pain. Now her skies smile back to us in secret sympathy. Her stars—"a beauty and a mystery"—look down on us in pitying tenderness. We lie like children on her bountiful breast, full of her affluence and fed by her smile. Lovingly she keeps her dangers locked from us, warning us of the penalties, sure and swift, that follow her violated laws. Is she not the bond that links our souls to their Creator? Does he not speak to us in her winds and waters, her stars and clouds, and trees and blossoms?

Is not God's voice as much in our hearts to-day, as it was in the hearts of his people six thousand years ago? Is the gift of his inspiration more rare now than then? If we reject this inner revelation of his spirit, what have we to lean on? A chaos of human creeds and dogmas to be taken at second-hand. Oh friends, is it for us who, with inly-bleeding hearts, have sought the bread of life, to suffer the sacred truths of God to be narrowed down for us to the paltry limits of some cold sectarian creed? Shall we give our conscience over to the keeping of these, to be forever held in a bondage hurtful to our souls to all eternity—the bondage of spiritual death? Our Evangelical friends send missionaries to the Orientals, who have a religion and a faith that was old when Britain and America were full of savages. They call them by the polite name of heathen! They "count the gray barbarian lower than the Christian child." But the "gray barbarian" teaches us a lesson of Oriental courtesy. He sends no missionaries to us to win us to the faith of Confucius, or persuade us to rally under the Crescent. He never seeks to fetter our conscience with his peculiar views. He leaves us to work out our own salvation in our way. Protestant England and America and Catholic France may learn a wholesome lesson from him,—the lesson of non-interference with the individual liberty of conscience,—the lesson of trusting the spiritual welfare of all men to God and themselves.

DON'T FORGET THE OLD FOLKS AT HOME.

[From Aikman's "Life at Home."]

There is always a liability, when sons and daughters have gone away from the home of their childhood and have formed homes of their own, gradually to lose the old attachments and cease to pay those attentions to their parents which were so easy and natural in the olden time. New associations, new thoughts, new cares, all come in, filling the mind and heart; and, if special pains be not taken, they crowd out the old loves. This ought never to be. You should remember that the change is with you and not with those you left behind. You have everything new, much that is attractive in the present and bright in the future; their hearts cling to the past, they have most in memory.

When you went away, you knew not, and will never know till you experience it, what it cost them to give you up, nor what a vacancy you left behind. They have not, if you have, any new loves to take the place of the old. Do not, then, heartlessly deprive them of what you can give of attention and love.

Visit your parents. If you live in the same place, let your step be, perhaps daily, a familiar one in the old home; if you are miles, yea, many miles away, make it your business to go to them. In this matter do not regard time or expense; the one is well spent and the other will be fully, yea a hundred-fold repaid. When some day the word reaches you, flashed over the telegraph, that father or mother has gone, you will not think them much, those hours of travel which last bore you to their side.

Write to your parents. I have known father and mother wait with sick hearts through weary months, longing that some word might reach them from an absent son. They have watched the mails till in despair they have ceased to expect any more, and while they may not have the grief of a great bereavement, they have what is almost as bad, the bitter consciousness that they are not in mind enough even to call out a few poor lines from one whose infancy and early years they watched with sleepless love. Sons are often guilty of this crime—I cannot call it less—from sheer neglect or indolence. While an hour, perhaps a few moments, would suffice to write a letter which would give unspeakable satisfaction, they let months and even years slip away in utter indifference to all the pain they are causing. Oh, how full is many a mother's heart of sorrow and foreboding, when just a few words from an absent son would fill it with joy and praise! Such indifference or neglect is shameful and wicked. One need not wonder that sons guilty of it are not prospered, that they wait in vain for those turns of fortune which will send them home, as they dream, to surprise the old neighborhood with their wealth. Their thoughtlessness has been productive only of disaster. Keep up your intercourse with father or mother; do not deem it sufficient to write when something important is to be told; do not say, "No news is good news." If it be but a few lines, write them; write, if it be only to say—"I am well," if it be only to send the salutation that says they are "dear," or the farewell that tells them you are "affectionate" still. The little messengers shall be like caskets of jewels, and the tears that fall fondly over them will be treasures for you.

OUR WORK.

At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, besides the usual committees on Publication and Finance, two new committees were appointed; one on Conventions, to carry out the vote passed at the late annual meeting of the Association, recommending the holding of four conventions during the year in different parts of the country outside of Boston; and another on Lectures, authorized to make provision for a course of Sunday lectures in Horticultural Hall in Boston the coming winter, similar to those which have been given on Sunday afternoons in the same Hall the past two seasons. These committees are already at work on arrangements for the conventions and lectures.

The Committee on Publication will soon have the pamphlet report of the proceedings at the May meeting ready for circulation. It may be before the public by the time that this paragraph is printed. As in previous years, it has been somewhat delayed by the desire of the various speakers to revise the proofs of their respective addresses; and in this annual Report, which contains much matter of permanent worth, we prefer to sacrifice dispatch to accuracy. The Report this year is to be specially valuable, containing, as it does, a larger number of carefully prepared addresses than those of preceding years.

PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS' YEARLY MEETING.

The usual printed Report of the Progressive Friends' Yearly Meeting at Longwood, Pa., has been issued. This meeting, which was held in the first week of June and continued three days, appears to have been one of great interest. Wm. Lloyd Garrison and Wm. Henry Channing were present, and took a prominent part in the discussions. Testimonies were presented and adopted, after being before the meeting for free debate, on "Progress of Equal Rights"; "Temperance"; "Prison Reform"; "Suffrage for Woman"; "The Indian Question"; "Religion and the Common Schools"; "The use of Tobacco"; "Public and Private Charity." These "Testimonies" are printed in full in the Report, and show the Progressive Friends to be fully alive on all important social and reformatory questions of the day.

THE CHINESE IN AMERICA.

The one topic which the newspapers of America are now discussing, is the introduction of Chinamen into the country. Now that these people are not confined to the lacific coast, but are following the railroad east,--that a colony of them has even penetrated into Massachusetts, that another is in Louisiana, and another on its way to Georgia,—the subject has suddenly become one of national interest and importance. It has several phases, and touches the interests of the country at several distinct points. It touches especially the interests of capital and labor; and thus far in the Eastern States the opposition to Chinese immigration seems to spring mainly from the Labor Reform Societies. But it involves also a political question, and as such has already appeared in the debates of Congress. It involves a new question of race, and a new religious problem for this country to work out. It is in this latter aspect that the Free Religious Association is especially interested in the subject. Vigorous attempts will of course be made to convert the Chinese who come here to Christianity,—with what success remains to be seen. That their religion, if they take up their abode in this country, will be modified in time, may be set down as pretty certain. But have they nothing to give as well as receive? We should answer this question in the affirmative. The conversion does not need to be wholly on one side. We believe that these people may set for America some good lessons in religion, and that China, out of her ancient stability and learning, has some valuable contributions to make to the future civilization and virtue of the human race. Let us receive the Chinese on the principle of the Golden Rule, taught by both Confucius and Jesus, and so work out together the momentous problems, social, political, and religious, that are devolved upon the country.

The debate in Congress on the question arose from an effort of Senator Sumner to strike the word "white" out of the new Naturalization Law that was before the Senate. He moved this amendment with the special purpose of giving the benefit of naturalization to the Chinese as well as to immigrants from other nations. He did not succeed in his effort, but the matter will not rest there. We make the following extract from one of Mr. Sumner's speeches on the question toward the end of the debate:—

The senator from Oregon says that my proposition gives to millions of heathens and pagans power to control our institutions. How and when have I made any such proposition? I wish the senator were here, that I might ask him to explain this unjustifiable exaggeration. How and when? I make no proposition that I do not find in the history of my country. I simply ask you to stand by the Declaration of your fathers. I say nothing about millions of heathens and pagans. I do not ask to give them power or control. Full well do I know that there are no millions of heathens or pagans, and no other millions on this earth, that can control the institutions of this republic. I know that we stand too firm to suffer from any such contact. Fearlessly we may go forward and welcome all comers, for there can be no harm here; the heathens and pagans do not exist whose coming can disturb our republic. Worse than any heathen or pagan abroad are those in our midst who are false to our institutions. "Millions of heathens and pagans!" Whence are they to come? From China? But if they come for citizenship, then, as I said this morning, do they give the pledge of loyalty to the republic; and how can you fear them if they enter your courts and with oaths and witnesses ask to be incorporated with our citizenship?

Mr. Stewart. Allow me to ask the senator if he knows any way in which they can give a pledge that they would understand as binding on them?

Mr. Sumner. Precisely as an Englishman, a Scotchman, an Irishman, a Frenchman, a German, a Swede, a Dane, a Russian, or an African may give a pledge; precisely as the senator may give a pledge. I have seen the senator go up to that table and take the oath. The senator is able. He knows that I know that; but does the senator suppose that he surpasses in ability many of the Chinese who might come here? Does the senator suppose that he feels more keenly the oath that he took at the desk than a Chinese might feel it? I am not speaking of those who may come over here in enforced labor. I join with the senator in effort to stop that. But I am speaking of the intelligent Chinese, so well and satisfactorily described by the senator from Missouri [Mr. Schurz] this morning, who come voluntarily to join their fortunes with ours. Suppose they come, where is the peril? Sir, it is against common sense to imagine peril from such a source.

The senator from Missouri has shown you how slowly they must come according to the natural order of things, how many decades of years it must take before there will be a million of them, while meanwhile our population is swelling by unknown millions, so that when we have a solitary million of Chinese we shall have one hundred millions of intelligent Americans treading this continent, and yet the senator from Nevada is afraid. "What! a soldier and afraid!" What! a senator of the United States anxious about a million of Chinese twenty-five or thirty years from now absorbed in that mighty one hundred millions which will then compose our population! The senator is not in earnest; he cannot be.

He was certainly excited in speech, if I may judge from his manner; but I really believe that in quiet thought, reviewing this whole question, he will see that he has hastily taken counsel of fear rather than of reason. Let the senator put trust in the republic, and those ideas which are its strength and glory.

The senator from Oregon wound up another passage by charging me and those who voted with me, particularly myself, with an intention or with conduct calculated—I quote now his own words—"to put the destinies of this nation into the hands of Joss-worshippers." Sir, that is a strong, pungent phrase; but is it true? Who here proposes any such thing? How can Joss-worshippers obtain control of the destinies of this nation? Will any senator be good enough to tell me? By what hocus-pocus, by what necromancy, by what heathen magic will these Joss-worshippers obtain the great ascendancy? Why, sir, it is to disparage this republic of ours, it is to belittle it, when you imagine any such thing. The peril exists only in imagination; it is an illusion, not a reality.

Then the senator proceeded to denounce the Chinese as imperialists and pagans. Pagans perhaps, though senators who have ever looked into those books which have done so much for the Chinese mind will hesitate before they use harsh language in speaking of their belief. Has any senator read the system of Confucius, uttered before that of the Savior, and yet containing truths marvellously in harmony with those which fell from his lips? Throughout this great, populous empire the truths of Confucius have been ever regarded as we regard our Scriptures. They are the lesson for the young and the old, and the rule for government and for rulers; they are full of teachings of virtue. And yet the Chinese are called pagans! Imperialists they may be while they remain in China, for their ruler is an emperor. But what are Frenchmen? Are they not imperialists? What are Russians? Are they not imperialists? And yet will any senator rise here and say that a Frenchman, that a Russian shall not be admitted to naturalization? I take it not. Of course the Frenchman, the Russian, and the Chinese will begin by renouncing imperialism. Therefore it is perfectly idle to say that he is an imperialist.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAYER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

In a village in Southern Missouri, a few days ago, a nice young man put a sheet around him to scare a Dutchman. The Teutonic gentleman says, "I just jump off my wagon and vip der ghost all de time. I would vip him if he was a whole grave-yard." Some one asked the young man what ailed his black eye, and he said he had received bad news from Germany.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Malaria.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

[An Address read at the "Mass Meeting of Liberals" in the Adams St. Park, July 17, 1870.]

If any one principle can be regarded as practically an axiom in America, so clear and self-evident to the public mind that it no longer needs to be discussed or defended, it is the principle that UNIVERSAL EDUCATION IS THE ONLY GUARANTEE OF UNIVERSAL FREEDOM. The ignorant man is always at the mercy of sharpers; the ignorant nation is always at the mercy of tyrants. Intelligence, highly developed and widely diffused, is the absolute condition of a permanent national prosperity. In a speech delivered only a few weeks ago in Congress, Hon. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, thus expressed what is the conviction, I believe, of the whole American people:—

"Universal education is essential to the national existence. It is essential to the administration of the Government of this nation by the persons whose constitutional privilege and whose constitutional duty it is to administer it. It is also essential to the accomplishment of the great objects the Constitution is intended to secure. It is the best cement of perfect union. The general welfare is best promoted by it. There can be no general welfare without it. It is the best and only guarantee of republican government, and the only security of the blessings of liberty. It is strength in war; it is wealth in peace. By it flourish art, manufactures, commerce,—all that constitutes greatness, all that constitutes glory."

So all-important to the welfare, nay, to the very existence of a free State is the universal education of its people, that John Stuart Mill, of England, than whom no one could be more jealous of individual liberty, takes the ground that the education of all children born within the limits of a State is a public duty, and should be required by law. "Is it not," he asks, in his invaluable Essay on Liberty, "almost a self-evident axiom that the State should require and compel the education of every human being who is born its citizen?" In this opinion I do not see how any thoughtful and liberal mind can long hesitate to concur. Who would dispute the duty of the State to protect an innocent child from the abuse or cruelty of a brutal parent? What abuse could be worse, what cruelty more outrageous, than wilfully to withhold from the child the priceless privilege of education, and thus doom him to the life of a mere "hewer of wood and drawer of water?" The State is as much bound to protect the child's mind from the deprivation of knowledge, as it is to protect his body from deprivation of food or drink. Surely, the parent has no more right to starve the one, than he has to starve the other. Besides, self-protection on the part of the State demands the education of the children within its borders, as the only possible radical cure of pauperism and crime. The children who grow up into vice and idleness, especially in our large cities, are nine cases in ten the victims of circumstances, and could be rescued from the gutter, the slum, and the Police-court, by having an honorable career opened to them. It is the duty of the State to see to it that a good education is the birthright of every child. In no other way can universal education be secured; in no other way can universal freedom be guaranteed.

I maintain, therefore, that our Common School System is the very basis and corner-stone of our free republic. Whoever strikes a blow at that, strikes a blow at our own liberty. Whatever impairs its efficiency or lessens its hold on the heart of the people, to that extent saps the very foundation of American institutions. The greatness of our common country depends on the number and excellence of our public schools. It was the deplorable ignorance of the South, which was the direct effect of slavery, that made the terrible rebellion possible; and if we ever mean to render another rebellion impossible in the future, it must be by educating all the children of the nation. The primer is a more potent force than the bayonet, and will yet, I trust, defeat the schemes of all our foes. Every wise and patriotic person will look upon our common school system as our best and only defence against the dangers arising from a rapidly increasing and heterogeneous population. Far better could we afford to lose all our accumulated wealth than that; for that is the goose that lays our golden eggs. Cost what it may, our system of public schools must be preserved, developed, and improved.

Now it is because a real and alarming danger threatens this system, that we have met in this place to-day. It may seem to many to be a very remote and insignificant danger; but to others it seems a danger which cannot too soon be comprehended and provided against. In a very brief and simple manner I wish to point it out, and suggest the remedy which, if adopted in season, I believe will wholly obviate it.

There are two theories of education in this country, each held by a large number of persons, and each logically consistent with itself,—I mean, the American and the Romish. Besides these, there is also the Protestant Christian theory, or rather practice (for it does not deserve the name of a theory), a sort of compromise between the other two, and, like every compromise between incompatibles, weak and self-conflicting. Allow me to sketch the outlines of each of these two theories, and show what bearing they have on the practical question at issue.

The Romish theory is that this world, compared with a world to come, is of no intrinsic importance; that it is merely a school of preparation for another life, and that the Catholic Church is the heaven-appointed instructor to declare by authority "what the nature of this preparation should be. Salvation from sin and hell is, according to Rome, the sole aim of life; and to this every other aim should yield. Now Rome teaches that there is no salvation outside of the Roman Church; and that no one can belong to the Roman church who does not receive with unquestioning faith all its doctrines, and submit with unreserved obedience to all its discipline. To the Roman Catholic, therefore, the education of children is simply the beginning of a life-long education in the doctrines and discipline of his Church. This is his faith, his sincere and inherited faith, from which he dares not depart on peril of his salvation; and nothing can be more illiberal than to scoff at it as hypocritical.

We see, then, what kind of a school-system the Catholic must desire. He will want a school in which the ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIGION shall be the chief thing taught, all other branches of education being subordinate and comparatively unimportant. In fact, where the Roman system is in unrestricted operation, as it has until recently been in Italy, Spain, Austria, and other parts of the world, nothing else has been taught, and the people have been sunk in the grossest ignorance. Rome knows well enough that she has no enemy so dangerous as intellectual enlightenment; knowledge is emancipation from her power. For this reason the present Pope, in his famous "Syllabus," pronounced it a damnable error to hold that "the whole control of the public schools, wherein the youth of any Christian State is educated only the episcopal seminaries being in some degree excepted, may and should be assigned to the civil authority, and so assigned to it, that no right be recognized, in any other authority whatever, to interfere with the school discipline, the direction of studies, the conferring of degrees, the selection or approbation of teachers." [XLV.] He pronounced it to be another damnable error to hold that "the best constitution of civil society requires that the public schools, which are open to the children of all classes, and that public institutions universally which are devoted to higher literary and scientific instruction and to the education of youth, be released from all authority of the Church, from her moderating influence and interference, and subjected wholly to the will of the civil and political authorities, to be conducted according to the pleasure of the rulers and the standard of the common opinions of the age." [XLVII.] The Pope thus claims for his Church exclusive control of the education of the young, in order to inculcate her own dogmas, and insure her own supreme control over the mind, heart, and life of every individual,—pronouncing it another damnable error to hold that "that method of instructing youth can be approved by Catholic men, which is separated from the Catholic faith and from the power of the Church, and which has regard exclusively, or at least principally, to a knowledge of natural things only, and to the ends of social life on earth." [XLVIII.]

Now with this theory of the relation of his Church to the public schools, what else can the Catholic do than to hate and seek the destruction of the school-system which prevails in America? Its one great and irremediable defect is, that it is not wholly under the control of the Church; nor can he ever become reconciled to it, until the Church acquires control of it. Hence Archbishop Purcell writes to the Cincinnati Board of Education, in September, 1869,—“We, as Catholics, can not approve of that system of education for youth which is apart from instruction in the Catholic faith and the teaching of the Church.” Hence Mr. McMasters, editor of the New York Freeman's Journal, declares in his paper:—"I will not suffer my child to go to the poor-house for its dinner, nor to wear the clothes of the alms-house, so long as I can prevent it. And as little will I suffer the political power to dispense poor-house instruction to my child." And again:—"We do not speak at random, but have well weighed our thoughts, when we say that, in our most firm conviction, the citadel of Antichrist in the United States is the public school system." And once more, with unmistakable emphasis:—"Let the public school system go to where it came from—the devil."

That the Catholics, therefore, or at least the consistent Catholics, hate our common school system with deadly and inveterate hatred, is plain both from their theory, their language, and their action. They demand, and in some places have actually secured, a division of the school funds, and have thus greatly endangered our educational system. This system at present is not yet thoroughly American,—that is, thoroughly secular. But before I criticise it at all, I must explain what I understand by a school system which shall be thoroughly American.

The liberal theory of education is, like the Catholic theory, based on general views of life and its objects.

The liberal says,—“While I am in this world, I must live for it,—discharge its duties, enjoy its pleasures, and bear its pains, as well as I can. If there is a life hereafter, as our hearts prompt us to hope, it must be the natural continuation of this life, and will care for the things of itself.” With this view of human existence and its appropriate objects, the education of the young will aim to fit them for the part they must play here on earth. Whatever in the opinion of all shall tend to make them wiser, happier, more useful, more noble, that will be taught in the schools. But since people differ widely in their beliefs concerning religion, and since the public schools, being supported by taxes paid by all, are to be used for the benefit of all, the only just course will be to teach in these schools what all are willing to have taught there, and to exclude whatever is a grievance to any class of the people. It is plain that, under the present condition of things, religion (I use the word in its commonest sense) is in this country one of the things to be excluded from the schools. The Jew will not wish his child taught Christianity, neither will the Chinese, when he comes; the Protestant will not wish his child taught Catholicism, nor will the so-called infidel wish his child taught religion under any of its forms. Justice will be fully satisfied, if nothing is taught in the schools which is a grievance to any class of persons. In short, if the schools are entirely secularized, and devoted to studies of practical advantage in this life, while instruction in religion is left to be imparted by those who want it in other and more appropriate places, the problem is solved so far as justice and equal rights are concerned. The schools will be open to all on the same terms; nothing will be taught which is offensive to any; and the only charge that can be brought will be that certain things will be left untaught which may be desired by some. This objection will be against the very attempt to support public schools at all. If it be an injustice to leave untaught what any person may happen to wish taught, then a just system of public instruction is an impossibility.

It is just here that the battle lies between the Romish and American systems. The liberal is perfectly willing to send his child with Catholic children to a school from which religion is entirely excluded; but if he can help it, the Catholic will not send his child to such a school with Jewish, “infidel,” or even Protestant children. He will send his child to no school in which his own faith is not taught. His conscience is hurt, unless he can control the schools,—that is, unless he can govern his neighbors just as he pleases. Nothing will suit him but the privilege of imposing his belief on all the world. In other words, he is bound either to rule or ruin,—either to control the public schools according to his own notions, or else to break up the whole public school system altogether. The issue, therefore, between the Romish and American systems is absolute and irreconcilable. We have got to fight it out, just as we did the slavery rebellion. The Catholics are not content with equal rights in our schools. They demand control, or else the ruin of our school system by the division of our school fund. The welfare of our children, the safety of the republic, the interests of humanity, require the maintenance of a system of universal and free education. The Catholics are welcome to their share of the benefits of it; nothing should be retained in the schools which can possibly wound their conscience. But when they turn about and say in effect,—“Justice is not enough; equal rights are not enough; relieve us from our school-taxes or divide the school-money; if you won’t give us control of your schools, we will break them up;”—then we have a clean issue, and must fight it out. A conscience that is not content with justice and equal rights, but enjoins aggression on other consciences, may be very sincere, but it is also very misguided; and it must give way to a better-instructed conscience. If it comes to this, the Catholics must make the best of it. Unless we give up our free government, we can not give up our universal education; but we must make it as free to Catholics as to any others. We must concede to them perfect equality of rights; we must concede to them all freedom of conscience which stops short of domineering over other consciences. But if your conscience requires you to be a despot, and mine requires me to be a freeman, I see no help for it but to fight the battle out to the bitter end.

Thus between the Romish and American systems there will be a clean and square issue sooner or later. But to-day our American system is not perfected, and retains features which are a just cause of grievance to the Catholics, as well as to the Jews, free-thinkers, and so forth. The reading of the Bible (especially the King James version of it) without note or comment is just as much the symbol of the Protestant faith, as saying mass or making the sign of the cross is a symbol of the Catholic faith. To retain this or any kindred symbol in the schools is an infringement of equal rights; and the Protestants are guilty of gross injustice in obliging the Catholics to support schools thus flying the Protestant flag. SO LONG AS THE BIBLE IS READ IN THE SCHOOLS, JUST SO LONG ARE THEY PROTESTANT SCHOOLS; AND THIS FACT JUSTIFIES THE CATHOLICS IN DEMANDING A DIVISION OF THE SCHOOL MONEY. You cannot blame them for objecting to support Protestant schools, when you yourself would object to supporting Catholic schools. No—this will not do. If the schools are to be supported by both Catholics and Protestants, (to say nothing of rationalists, sceptics, freethinkers, unbelievers, and liberals of all sorts), then the schools should be neither Catholic nor Protestant, but neutral,—secular; and then all just cause of complaint is taken away. No more favor will be shown to one than to the other; all classes will stand on precisely the same level.

The hue and cry that is made, therefore, that taking the Bible out of the schools is a concession to the Catholics, is just the reverse of the truth. It is shrewdly got up for effect, to hide the real issue. It is a concession to the Catholics to keep the Bible in the schools, for this gives them a just reason for calling for a division of the school funds. If they must pay for your Protestant schools, you must pay for their Catholic schools. Why not? Is not that fair? The only way to concede nothing is to make our own stand a just one by removing all cause of just complaint. Make the issue clear and plain,—then let the conflict come. The Protestant theory of education is “neither fish, flesh nor fowl;” it is in the main secular, but also partly ecclesiastical. So far as it enjoins religious instruction in the common schools, it is a union of Church and State, and thus conflicts with the first principles of republican government. Bible-reading in the schools is in fact a relic of Catholicism, and so far justifies the Catholic demand. The only just and safe course is to forbid it altogether.

It is from no unfriendly feeling to the Bible that I call for its exclusion from the schools; I simply maintain that the schools are no fit place for its use. There are eminent Protestant clergymen, like Dr. Spear, who are as strongly opposed to Bible-reading in the schools as I am. Their reason is substantially the same, namely, respect for equal rights. It is a grievance to the Jew, to the Catholic, to all non-Protestants, that the badge of Protestant supremacy should be so stubbornly retained. Its retention is deepening the antipathy to our whole school system in thousands of minds; and it is because I see real danger in this growing disaffection that I feel anxious to remove its cause. What would America be worth without her free schools,—her boast, her glory, her crown? As one who enjoyed their benefits in early life, I would prove my gratitude by standing up for them now, even against their foolish friends.

Justice and expediency alike demand the prohibition in the schools of Bible-reading and all other religious exercises,—justice, because the dominant Protestant Christian sentiment of the country has no right to use the common school system as an engine for its own dogmatic and sectarian purposes,—expediency, because this practical injustice furnishes to all enemies of our system of free popular education a terrible weapon for its overthrow. The longer our present unjust and inexpedient policy continues, the more active and perilous will become the growing jealousy of all taxation for school purposes. We must either make our schools equally free to all, oppressing none; or else we must cease to levy educational taxes. That is the only alternative. The American people will never be content to raise a public fund to be squabbled over by bigots and politicians. The fund must be for all alike, without favor or distinction; or else the sects must support each its own educational institutions. And all well-informed persons know how miserably trashy all sectarian schools and colleges are. They are simply hot-beds of propagandism placed under the control of ministers, and used chiefly to make more of the same sort. It will be an evil day for America when our beneficent, universal and democratic school system, in which children breathe the bracing air of freedom and equal rights and republican ideas, shall be supplanted by a host of petty and rival systems, each setting itself up as superior to all the rest, and fostering a spirit of narrowness, bigotry, and pride. Long may that day be averted!

In what I have said, I have looked to the broad principles of this Bible question, rather than to the details of it; for it is a question, trivial as it seems to many, that will put to the test the sincerity of the American people in professing to carry on a government by republican principles. I have great confidence that the people will stand this test. Although we cannot expect immediate success in a movement of this character, we shall have as allies the natural keenness of the American intellect and the natural love of fair play which is engendered by republican ideas. The stars in their courses will fight against the Sissera of sectarian domination. There will be little room here for Papacy or semi-Papacy. In the end, I cannot doubt, religious exercises of all sorts will be abolished in our schools, and our system of education, thoroughly secularized, will attain a degree of excellence of which we can now form but a feeble conception.

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOLS.

Its Exclusion from the Toledo Schools Advocated.

MEETING OF THE TOLEDO LIBERALS—ADDRESSES BY F. E. ABBOT, MAYOR KRAUS, MISS PECKHAM, AND DR. GRAF.

[From the Toledo Blade of July 18.]

The friends, in Toledo, of the movement to exclude the use of the Bible from the public schools, which has agitated the public mind so extensively during the past year, held a meeting yesterday for the purpose of discussing and urging the said exclusion in our own city schools. The meeting was held in the grove at the head of the Adams Street Railway, and was made up of members of the First Independent Society and others of no religious creed.

The Toledo Sengerbund was in attendance and at intervals enlivened the meeting with excellent vocal music. No devotional exercises were had, but all was broadly secular, the speakers being enthusiastically applauded whenever a bold, stirring sentiment was uttered. Dr. Thos. M. Cook presented the several speakers to the assembly.

In accordance with the published programme, Mr. F. E. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, opened the discussion by reading an essay on “The Bible in the Public Schools.” [We omit the abstract of the essay, as it is printed in full above.—ED. INDEX.]

After music Mayor Kraus was announced and spoke in an earnest manner as follows:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—I am not the one to speak on this subject, as I do not feel competent to do justice to it. I am an American citizen, not from birth, but from choice, because I love its liberty. I am among those who believe that this liberty needs some improving. It may be too late to try, but I am flattering my countrymen that the man with liberal ideas is as good as that citizen who is sectarian in his belief. You can do no good by claiming that you are better than any one else. I don’t want the education of my children to be based on prejudice. I don’t want them to go to a school where they are not considered equal to the rest, but I want them to go where all children are equal, where they are taught that those who do right shall have the benefit of it. For this reason I always objected to having a religious book in the public schools. I would not have a superintendent who would teach the scholars that the infidels are not as good as anybody else, and that the Jew children will go to hell. It is because such ideas are taught in our schools that I have declined a position in the Board of Education. Mr. Marx was surprised, when he came to America, because I did not take a part in the government of the schools; but I gave him my reason, and he sustained me. I had rather go for dividing the school fund than to support a doctrine which I do not approve. Religion is a matter of choice; and if any one desires to have his children educated as a Catholic, a Methodist or a Jew, let him; but I have no right to say what your children should believe or what they should not believe. I want my children instructed in all that is right.

It ought to be one of you Americans to discuss this question in your own language. But my heart and hand are with you for liberty of the greatest extent in the schools. They should be governed for the benefit of all without regard to sect.

Miss L. Peckham, who lectured here last winter on Woman Suffrage, was next introduced, and urged in the main the theories advanced by the preceding speakers. She claimed that the exclusion of the Bible from the schools was not a question of the infallibility of any religion, but simply of the functions of government. The safety of our republic lies in maintaining an entire distinction between church and state. Government should be confined to maintain justice among its citizens. We should know nothing of toleration of religion in America as in Rome, where no creed except Catholicism is tolerated. Equality is the American idea. Individual conscience should be the chooser of religion. The speaker would “cast no slur at any one’s religious faith.” She believed the reading of the Bible in the schools would have been done away with long ago, were it not for the conservatism of the human mind. There are but few who are so bold as to cut loose from their inherited notions. In the name of justice, we should know a Jew and Greek, home-born and foreign-born, male and female, heathen and Christian, as a common brotherhood in the enjoyment of the fullest political and religious freedom.

Guido Marx, Esq., being called upon, favored the movement on the ground that all ecclesiastical organizations of the world were doing their best to establish their respective dogmas, and, being a liberal in all things, he would put to rout all sectarian contestants for power over the young, by excluding the Bible from the schools, which is the source of controversy.

Dr. Edward Graf, the founder and for many years the speaker of the free religious societies in Milwaukee and Philadelphia, was next introduced and spoke in German. He asserted that the religious liberty of the country was one of the main pillars of its free institutions. No book in the world was less fit for a school-book than the Bible. No Roman Catholic could with good conscience send his child to a school where as a reading book the Bible was employed, and from it thought that the immortal Nazarene replied to a man who accosted him: "Good master!"—"Why do you call me good? Nobody is good but God alone." A book in which the same great man expresses himself thus: "You shall not suffer yourself to be called master; one only is your master, Christ; you shall not allow yourself to be called father; one only is your father, he is in the heavens."

But Protestant parents can no more wish to have their children taught on the first leaves of the Bible a history of the creation of the world, which, by the subsequent teachings of geology, are proved to be fables and fictitious stories. A youthful mind will become impressed by such enormous contradictions with that which has been instilled into him as religious belief, and will far more become inclined to frivolity and finally to despise all that the church seeks to teach as sacred belief, than to real piety, which is ever one and the same with rectitude and virtue.

Let us educate our children, through the conservation of the public free school system, to be righteous and virtuous American citizens, and leave it to the numberless sects to make them "citizens of heaven."

Music closed the meeting, when the gathering dispersed.

In the evening the same question was discussed by the Radical Club in the Church of the First Independent Society. A motion was adopted to decide at the next meeting of the Club, the proposition to present a petition to the City Council asking the exclusion of the Bible from the Toledo public schools.

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Commercial of July 19.]

Our citizens were not a little surprised by an announcement on Saturday, that a public meeting was to be held on Sunday in a grove in the 7th Ward, "of all persons interested in the maintenance of an unsectarian Common School system," and that evening the "Radical Club of Toledo would meet to deliberate on the adoption of a petition to the Board of Education, for the discontinuance of all religious exercises in the public schools of this city."

According to this appointment a meeting was held in the grove at which the Toledo Sængerbund furnished vocal music and addresses were made by Mr. F. E. Abbot, of the Independent Society, Mayor Kraus Miss Peckham, Guido Marx, and Dr. Graf. The key-note of the occasion was given by Mr. Abbot in the following declaration of sentiment:

While I am in this world, I must live for it, discharge its duties, enjoy its pleasures and bear its pains, as well as I can. If there is a life hereafter, it will care for the things of itself. With this view the education of the young will aim to fit them for the part they must play here on earth. But since people differ widely in their religious beliefs, and since the public schools, being supported by taxes paid by all, are to be used for the benefit of all, the only just course will be to teach in these schools what all are willing to have taught, and to exclude whatever is a grievance to any class.

Mayor Kraus took substantially the same ground. He said he was an American citizen from choice, because he "loved its liberty," but he thought "this liberty needed some improving." He further said, according to the Blade's report:

You can do no good by claiming that you are better than any one else. I don't want the education of my children based on prejudice. I don't want them to go to a school where they are not considered equal to the rest, but I want them to go where all children are equal, where they are taught that those who do right shall have the benefit of it. For this reason I always objected to having a religious book in the public schools. I would not have a Superintendent who would teach the scholars that the infidels are not as good as anybody else, and that the Jew children will go to hell. It is because such ideas are taught in our schools that I have declined a position in the Board of Education. Mr. Marx was surprised, when he came to America, because I did not take part in the government of the schools, but I gave him my reason and he sustained me. I had rather go for dividing the school fund than to support a doctrine I do not approve. Religion is a matter of choice, and if any one desires to have his children educated as a Catholic, a Methodist or a Jew, let him, but I have no right to say what your children should believe or what they should not believe. I want my children to be instructed in all that is right.

The other speakers but reiterated in substance the sentiments already quoted. In the evening the same question was discussed and a proposition made to petition the City Council for the exclusion of the Bible from the schools.

We have have neither time nor space here to discuss the proposition now for the first time boldly made in Toledo. We will only say, that the challenge to the best and most effective educational system the world ever saw, is plain and direct. It cannot be misunderstood. It is based on the assumption that American "liberty"—the fullest and freest among men—"needs" not only "some improving," but a good deal, amounting to an entire change both in its mode of manifestation and its basis; for when we get a system of education which shall not only be divested of all recognition of the religious principle in man, but "excludes whatever is a grievance to any class," we shall have something that neither human nor divine power has produced. It may be easy for theorists, from their stand-point, to conjure up visions of this kind; but when put to the test of practice, the illusion disappears.

There being citizens here who deem it their duty to advance such doctrines, we do not object to the discussion. For our own part, we cannot do less than enter our protest against both the policy suggested and the fallacious grounds on which it is based.

GREEK BRIGANDS.

THERE is a regular system of treating for the ransom of the captives. A letter is first conveyed by the robbers from the captive to his friends. This generally contains a safe-conduct for the messenger who shall be chosen to go to the robber camp and treat, and a plan marking out certain places he must stop at. He travels by night, on a white horse, and carries a small bell, which he rings at certain convenient and solitary situations, which is answered by a shrill whistle if all is well. Unless the whistle is heard he must not go on, and the whole plan is so arranged that the man himself does not know where he is finally going to; so that it is impossible for the authorities to discover the brigand's haunt thereby. At a certain spot the robbers meet him, and conduct him into the presence of the chief. Then a regular bargaining is commenced. The chief names a sum, which the messenger, if he is a man of determination, and represents well the insufficient means of the captive, often gets reduced. When the bargain is finally struck, the messenger goes back for the money by a different road to that he came by, and returns with the same ceremonies and precautions. The ransom is delivered to the chief in presence of all the band, who light a taper and examine the coins to see if they are good. The captive is then brought in, loosened from his ropes, his beard cut off, and then he is kissed by each robber on the cheek, whilst they all cry out "Kalleli!" that is to say, "Begone, and be of good health." Should the robbers be besieged during the bargaining, both captive and ransom are destroyed. The robbers' great object is to terrify the people into bringing sufficient ransom; therefore, when it is deficient, or the captive is too poor to pay at all, the most horrible cruelties are practised. There are several such cases known to have occurred quite lately. One man whose ransom was short of the sum named, was tortured, stripped naked, and slowly burned with a lighted fusee to such an extent that he can never recover. A boy of fifteen had his ear cut from the roots because a hundred drachmi of the ransom were wanting. But the most horrible account of all was as follows: Three peasants had been taken prisoners. Two of them were enabled, by the sale of their oxen, to make up a sum sufficient to content the brigands. The third was a poor man and could pay nothing. He was condemned to death. He fell at their feet for mercy. "The law forbids it," was the answer.—Cassell's Magazine.

LIONS ATTACKING AN ACTRESS.

A frightful scene, more exciting in its details than the very strongest blood and thunder tragedy that a Bowery audience ever witnessed, occurred at the Bowery Theatre on Saturday night. The performances were drawing to a close, expectation was on tip-toe to witness the brave and daring acts of Miss Minnie Wells with the Puma lions. The young lady entered upon the stage, made her courtesy to the audience, and immediately went into the cage containing the lions—the crowded audience meantime watching the exhibition with breathless interest. Suddenly, while the young lady was going through her performance with the animals, piercing screams broke the awe-struck silence of the theatre, and the audience were horrified at the sight of a huge lion seizing the young lady by the throat and lacerating her in such a frightful manner, that the blood poured in streams upon her dress. The actors and attendants upon the stage rushed forward and struck at the enraged brute, and finally succeeded in causing him to relinquish his hold upon Miss Wells, who was dragged from the cage in a fainting condition. She was carried home by her parents and received prompt surgical attention. The scene among the audience baffles description. Several women fainted, and men shouted with agony at witnessing a danger which they were powerless to prevent. Information of the event was brought to the Franklin street police station, and Captain Kennedy, of the Sixth Precinct, with a large force of police, was promptly on hand, and succeeded in restoring order, so that the theatre was cleared without further accident.—N. Y. World, May 30.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I have received copies of your able paper according to my request; and, after a careful perusal, I can truly say it suits me. I believe it is the 'bread' for which many souls now hunger. I have waited many years for its advent. And now, my dear Editor—my brother—I wish to congratulate you upon the position you have taken and the ability with which you maintain it. My heart overflows with grateful sympathy to you and the cause you have espoused. It is a cause that has long been dear to my heart. When a boy, I heard a story of an enthusiastic political Christian, of the Methodist persuasion, who, attending a prayer meeting in a time of great political excitement, while others were responding, in the usual somewhat vehement manner of the sect, to the powerful appeals of the brother who was 'leading in prayer,' roared out at the top of his voice,—'Hurrah for General Jackson!' This called forth from the 'elder' a rather stern rebuke for the wrong he had done in disturbing the worship of God by the untimely expression of his political sentiments, to which the devout and honest enthusiast replied,—'I can see no wrong in what I have done, for to me Religion pure and undefiled before God and man and genuine Democracy are one and the same thing.' That sentiment I early accepted as the expression of my faith, and such it remains to this hour. I have never been able to discover any logical half-way house or resting place between perfect spiritual freedom and the absolute despotism of Rome. Penholder asks in the Independent,—'Is it not cold out there?' And the Liberal Christian (?) says: 'It will probably have the field all to itself, and freeze up with its disciples in the soulless, Christless region of that pole towards which THE INDEX points.' Now is it possible that those who can write thus have ever 'experienced religion?' Surely, if they have, it must be a very shallow and conventional, not to say soulless, sort. During the last five years I have been, and am yet, a helpless invalid, bound hand and foot in the painful bonds of rheumatism; and during all the long, weary days and painful, sleepless nights my faith in the Unity of God and Nature and the Divinity of Humanity has not only cheered and sustained me, but has continued to grow stronger and take deeper root in my soul.

Warm human hearts have flowed with sympathy for me, 'as the rivers of waters,' and human hands moved by human love have constantly and ungrudgingly ministered to my wants, and been ever ready to do all that possibly could be done to alleviate my sufferings and make smooth my rugged, thorny pathway. Of those who have thus manifested their sympathy and revealed to me the depths of human love, some are Christians, but the greater number are not Christians; yet I can appreciate no difference in the quality of their love, and can truly say, in them all I love and worship God. And I confess, with the tenderest regard for the convictions of my Christian friends, that I am unable to conceive in what respect it is better, or more religious, to love and adore one of 'God's anointed' than the many who have been anointed with the same Divine Spirit of love; nor do I know how or why I should select some particular individual upon whom to fix my ideal of the Divine Humanity, to the exclusion of all others whose hearts are filled with love. I am quite sure that those who hold that Free or Universal Religion is a 'cold' and 'soulless' faith, incapable of sustaining the soul in the hour of trial, or inspiring the heart with love and noble, self-sacrificing devotion to duty and human good, have never eaten of the 'bread' of its life, nor drank of its crystal waters. Pardon me if I have trespassed upon your time or patience, for my heart is full. I have written what I have because, knowing the power of sympathy, I have thought, perhaps, from my testimony and experience, you might draw some small measure of encouragement and strength to sustain you in the darker hours of life and cheer you onward in your noble work. My wife, whose hand now writes my words, joins me in all my good wishes for your welfare and success, and in the hope that THE INDEX may point many thirsty souls to that fountain of life where all may come and drink freely of that water which 'whosoever drinketh shall never thirst again.'

AMALIA :

FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER.

Fair as a god from blest Valhalla straying,
Fairer than all Youth's radiant train was he;
Mild was his eye, as when the sun, a-Maying,
Laughs from the azure of the mirroring sea.

O rapturous paradise of nectared kisses!
As amorous flames together leap and twine,
As sharp-tones, breathing of celestial blisses,
Quiver and thrill in harmony divine;

So rushed, flowed, melted soul with soul, o'erbrim-ming,
And burning cheeks and trembling lips grew one,
And spirits rapt, while heaven and earth seemed swimming,
Dissolved and blended in a low, faint moan.

He goes, alack! and, sweet allurements giving,
In vain the timorous sigh still woos him back;
He goes, he's gone,—and every joy of living
Pines in despair, and dies in sad "Alack!"

The Index.

JULY 30, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

An able argument for the doctrine of philosophical necessity will be found among our "communications," to which we shall briefly reply hereafter. It will repay the careful study of those who are interested in this abstruse question. We could not print so long a communication, if we did not feel under obligation to do so in this case; and we do not mean to establish a precedent by printing it.

The Toledo Blade and Commercial, of July 23, have the following, which, as the French say, was given by "inspiration":—

THE FIRST UNITARIAN SOCIETY.—The First Unitarian Society having secured possession of their old Church, on the corner of Adams and Superior Sts., will hold services in it to-morrow. After that day they will have a short vacation, during which the Church will be raised to grade and otherwise improved. It will be reopened for regular services on the first Sunday in September.

The joke of the thing is, that the "First Unitarian Society," which was organized last autumn, never had any more right to the said church than they now have to the Boston State House, until last week, when they purchased the old wooden church of the First Independent Society for eight hundred dollars. It is, therefore, funny enough to talk of having "secured possession of their old church,"—as if they had been the victims of a foul conspiracy, and at last, like the virtuous prince in the fairy-tale, had come into possession of their own to the great discomfiture of the conspirators! A fondness for this style of misrepresentation and petty insinuation seems to run in the Unitarian blood.

The Pope has been at last formally declared infallible. Henceforth the poor old lady can issue, but not commit, "bulls." The Roman Catholic system has now been logically perfected; the next step will be the beginning of disintegration. The immediate effect, however, of the new dogma may possibly be schism to some extent, but also increased efficiency in the drilled army of ecclesiastics who aspire to conquer the world. The Jesuits have triumphed, and know well how to use their power; and they will doubtless put forth all their energies to get control of the New World. It is here rather than in Europe that Catholicism will meet its true antagonist—the principle of complete civil and religious freedom. When any considerable number of Americans shall have become convinced of the necessity of making our political system thoroughly secular, the battleground will be a fair one, and the battle will be decisive.

THE PARK MEETING.

According to previous announcement made through THE INDEX, the Toledo Blade, and numerous printed post-bills, a public meeting of Liberals was held in the Adams St. Park in this city, Sunday, July 17, to consider the Bible-in-Schools question. Reports of this meeting will be found elsewhere in our present issue. The attendance was good, and would have been better still, had it not been for the sweltering heat of the day, which kept many sympathizers at home. In every respect the demonstration was signally successful, and fully answered its purpose of calling the attention of the public to the movement proposed.

The evening session of the Radical Club, at which the same question was discussed, was the largest, the best, and the most earnest of all that we have attended; and it was manifest, from the number of strangers present, that interest in the movement was rapidly spreading. The question turned on the choice between two alternative petitions, the one simply stating that "for many and dissimilar reasons" the subscribers united in requesting the discontinuance of all religious exercises in the common schools, the other appending to this request the reasons which influence the Radical Club in making it. The former could be signed by Catholics and all others who, from any cause, sympathize in the actual object aimed at; the latter, only by those whose convictions are thoroughly radical. The former, therefore, which would get the most signatures, would derive all its weight from the influence of mere numbers; the latter, which would carry its principles on its face, would be a direct appeal to public opinion, and derive its weight from the truth of its ideas. To some of the Club it seemed best to adopt the former petition, to others the latter; and, being desirous of choosing wisely between these two possible courses, the Club postponed the decision to an adjourned meeting, to be held the Sunday following in the Park.

This adjourned meeting, however, was prevented by a heavy rain; and for various reasons it will not be held till August 7, at some place to be hereafter announced.

"BETTER, THANK YOU!"

The Toledo Commercial has had a terrific spasm of piety, but we are happy to be able to report its convalescence. It declined to publish the advertisement of the "Mass Meeting of Liberals," notwithstanding the temptations of filthy lucre; and it looked on with the consciousness of superior virtue, while that wicked and roaring Blade printed the same advertisement, "asking no questions for conscience' sake." What a sweet complacency must have pervaded the Commercial's bosom that night, as it said—"Now I lay me,"—and laid itself!

But, alas for the frail virtue of pious dailies! at the very next temptation the poor Commercial succumbed. The advertisement of the Radical Club Meeting, the week after, was irresistible; it came—it saw—it conquered! The immaculate sheet was polluted with the "infidel" announcement; but then—the ducats! What specific for a burnt conscience is equal to a greenback plaster?

The convulsion is past. The fit is gone. The spasm is over. "Holy Willie" is himself again!"

"I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou hast left in night,
That I am here afore thy sight,
For gifts and grace
A burnin' and a shinin' light
To a' this place.

"O Lord, thou kens what zeal I bear,
When drinkers drink and swearers swear,
And singin' here and dancin' there,
Wi' great and sma';
For I am keepit by thy fear
Free frae them a'."

SYMPATHY FOR PRUSSIA.

A public meeting was held in Gitskey's Grand Opera House Friday evening, July 22, by the Germans of Toledo, to express sympathy for Prussia in the great war which has broken out in Europe. Mr. Guido Marx was chosen chairman; addresses were made by Lieut.-Gov. Lee, Mayor Kraus, Mr. A. L. Gitskey, Miss L. Peckham, Mr. F. E. Abbot and others; and resolutions were adopted and ordered to be transmitted to the Kings of Prussia and Bavaria, expressing the goodwill of the meeting and their confidence in the success of the Prussian arms. Every liberal American must share these sentiments, and look to the terrible war just entered upon with sincere hope that, notwithstanding its miseries and crimes and devastation, it may yet promote the cause of German unity, and therefore, though indirectly, the cause of German liberty. Disunited Germany can never be free; Germany united must be free, sooner or later. Since carnage must come, may the eagles of victory perch upon the Prussian banner!

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR.

The New York Independent of July 21 reprints entire, in its column of "Current Religious Views," the admirable reply of Mr. Potter to the aspersions of the Milwaukee Index on Keshub Chunder Sen. This article was first published in the "Department of the Free Religious Association" in THE INDEX, No. 28. We are confident that the omission by the Independent to give due credit for it was accidental, since the Independent has hitherto always credited THE INDEX for all extracts from its columns; and we refer to the fact now simply because we were much pleased with this mark of appreciation of our friend's work. Mr. Potter has a very delicate task to fulfil in furnishing so much matter weekly which shall be interesting to our readers, yet not commit the Association to what may be his own private opinions; and every token of appreciation of the great tact and success with which he discharges this difficult duty is very grateful to our feelings. We believe we express the universal sentiment of the Association in hoping that he will long be willing to retain the position which he now fills so acceptably to all its members. The wide influence of the Association is, we believe, in no small measure due to the character and talents of its President and Secretary.

ERRATA.

Mr. W. S. Robinson ("Warrington," of the Springfield Republican), writes us a pleasant letter, saying that the passage seemingly attributed to him by our correspondent J. S. in THE INDEX, No. 22, was not a quotation at all, and in fact misrepresented his thought. We did not understand our correspondent to quote, but rather to imagine, as it were, a dialogue between Mr. Robinson and Mr. Wasson, freely reproducing the ideas of both without attempting to be very exact and without pretending to adhere to their language. At any rate we are responsible for the punctuation of the article in question, with the exception of a few errors in the printing; and if a mistake was made in this respect, it was probably due to our own understanding or misunderstanding of our correspondent's meaning. We are perfectly sure that J. S. did not intend to misquote; and we trust that this explanation will be satisfactory to Mr. Robinson.

Mr. John Chappellsmith, whose article, entitled "Ideal Types in Nature," appeared in THE INDEX, No. 28, wishes the sixth sentence of the last paragraph to be corrected thus:—"We may suppose this to be eternal, living matter, susceptible of successive modifications from physical forces, &c."

ADDRESS OF MISS L. PECKHAM

AT THE PARK MEETING IN TOLEDO, SUNDAY, JULY 17; AN ABSTRACT.

We have in this country a great system of Public Schools, carried on by the Government and supported by the taxes of all the people. The question for us to consider to-day is whether we shall have religion taught in those schools in any manner, by prayer-making, Bible-reading, or psalm-singing; or whether they shall be completely secularized.

This involves no question as to the worth of religion,—implies no conclusions as to the fallibility of the Bible; it is simply a question as to the functions of government, and whether the teaching of religion should be one of them. You and I may agree as to the value of religion, but we must not therefore infer that it is wise for the State to enforce or teach it. As Macaulay has said in one of his brilliant essays, bread-making is a more important and essential work than hat-making; but if the milliner insisted therefore on being a baker as well, we should probably have very poor hats and bread. The union of church and state belongs to a past age, and was then consistently worked out in the religious persecutions of which we have all read with horror. Learning from the experience of past centuries the interminable evils that flow from their union, our fathers wisely left religion on the firm foundation of individual convictions, to be supported by voluntary contributions. The very first Amendment of our federal Constitution declares: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." So imbued were they with this idea, that Jefferson, when President, would never appoint a day of public thanksgiving, believing it no part of his duty or office; and Madison hesitated long before signing a bill to incorporate a church. In the State of Ohio you have provisions of a similar nature:—"No religious test shall be required for the qualification for office." "No person shall be compelled to maintain any form of worship, nor shall any interference with the rights of conscience be permitted."

When in both Federal and State Constitutions the independence of church and state is so plainly declared as a fundamental principle of our Government, it is a glaring inconsistency to use the public or Government schools to teach any form of religion whatever. And this implies no disrespect to religion. It is simply declaring that in the body politic, as in the human body, different organs have different functions; that as, in animal life, the series beginning with the cell, which performs every function imperfectly, culminates in man, whose life is carried on by a complex organism, each organ confined to its single function, so the rude state where the chief is king, priest, warrior, must grow at last in a higher civilization to a differentiation of functions, when the State will perform its one duty of applying justice, neither meddling with nor teaching religion. The application of this principle to our schools would have long since been acknowledged but for the conservatism of the human intellect, which never allows of the full application of a new principle at once.

I was struck with the affirmation, made by a lawyer of Cincinnati last autumn when arguing this question in Court, that the Government had a right to prohibit the raising of heathen temples in this land. I am sorry to hear such assertions made by any American. Such a prohibition would be an odious and despotic precedent. If our German fellow-citizens choose to build a temple (which to Christians might seem heathenish enough) to the laws and forces of Nature, which alone they believe produce the phenomena of Nature; or if the Chinese build temples or Joss-houses and worship idols,—has the State of Ohio, has the Government of the United States any right to interfere? Such assertions must be met. If true, let us abate a measure of our high sounding pretensions, that in America there is liberty for all—that all men are equal before the law, and all religions. Equality, I say, not toleration; for that is alien to American thought. Such a word applies to countries with an established religion. But here we are equal. That idea has forced you, in the teeth of your own prejudices, to pass a Fifteenth Amendment, and will yet culminate in a Sixteenth. As George William Curtis said:—"The conscience of this nation sits in the way like a sphynx, proposing its riddle of true democracy. Presidents and parties, caucuses and candidates, failing to guess it, are remorselessly consumed."

We have boasted that here no tax-gatherer goes about to wring from men the extortions called church rates, to build up a faith they do not believe in; but, teaching religion in the schools, does not the school tax become a church-rate in a disguised form? It is not only a public inconsistency, but a private wrong, since Catholics, Infidels and Jews are compelled to pay towards upholding a faith they do not believe in. According to the new Constitution of Ohio the seventh section of the Bill of Rights declares that "No preference shall be given by law to any religious society." Can we dispute what has been proven here to-day, that reading the Bible is a Protestant exercise? Is that showing partiality to no religious sect—which has been called the "flag of Protestant supremacy?" Who besides the Protestants desires this Bible-reading? The Jew, who does not believe in the New Testament? the Catholic, who believes in another version of it? the infidel, the rationalist, the free religionist, who protest every day against this superstitious worship of a book? Even in Europe they are more just and consistent than we; for while they give religious instruction in their public schools consistently with their theories, no form of religion is allowed supremacy over others; but, as shown in Horace Mann's educational report, the Protestant clergy teach the Protestant children, the Romish clergy the Romish children.

If, as is claimed, there are children in our public schools who have no opportunity for religious instruction unless they receive it there, it is still no fault of the State or school. It is no disgrace to any man that he does not do another man's work. If there are poor children or orphans who have no religious teachings, it is a shame to the ministry which is paid to do this very thing; it is a shame to the churches which fail to care for the least of these little ones; it is a disgrace to those who bear the name of Christ, and believe that so great a salvation is offered through his name, if they fail to bear to all the Gospel tidings. Let the Christian philanthropist gather these little ones into Sabbath schools, and there teach their different tenets, and not insist on taking taxes from those who believe differently, or using our Government schools to disseminate their ideas.

The feeling of many, expressed here to-day by Mayor Kraus, that he would prefer a division of the school fund to the present regime, will soon leave us no alternative but to omit these ceremonies, or submit to a division of the school fund. And should it be divided, the schools would lose half their efficiency and value. With added expense there would be diminished results. They would become sectarian, on one side Catholic, the other Protestant, perhaps Jewish, and the nation lose the common ground where class prejudices are dissipated by daily intercourse. We must face this question. I take my stand with what seems to me immutable justice. I plant myself on the ideas of equality and freedom. To apply these principles is the great work of the future, and their price is "eternal vigilance." Liberty is like the genius in the Arabian tale which was sealed up in a casket in the sea, moving only with the ebb and flow of the restless waves. But one day the casket was found and opened, and the subtle genius, eluding all detaining hands, grew larger and larger till it reached sublime proportions, and encircled them like the horizon. Though they sought long, no power was strong or cunning enough to imprison it in its narrow setting again. In America the casket has been opened, and the form of liberty grows ever larger before our awe-struck eyes. If we would, we could not chain it again. Be ours the nobler task to follow its inspiration, and be never deaf to its faintest whisper.

FORGIVENESS AND REPENTANCE.

ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I am interested in your paper, and have some requests to make of you and your readers.

I have never said much upon the question of Religion, yet have thought sometimes that the idea Christian professors hold, in regard to REPENTANCE and FORGIVENESS of sins was one great incentive to mortals to commit crime.

According to the Christian theory, a man may commit any offence in the whole calendar of crime, and, by putting on a long face and asking to be forgiven, he stands as high as though he had always lived a pure, holy life. Now when a man commits murder, he is either acquitted forthwith by our tribunals, or the Christians and infidels combined sentence him to the gallows or confinement during his natural term of life.

If God is so good and merciful as to forgive all who ask to be forgiven, cannot mortals forgive each other on as short notice? Christians profess to try to follow after God's example set by him they call Christ. Do they follow the set pattern in any one point? I should like to see one Christian who would stand and be twice struck on the face, or who would give cloak or coat to a brother or sister in need. I should so love to have you or some of your readers, who write with a steady pen, write what you think of REPENTANCE and FORGIVENESS.

I have heard those subjects harped upon for more than fifty years; but very unsatisfactorily to my mind.

"NUTS FOR ORTHODOXY TO CRACK."

[Answer to queries of B. D. S. in THE INDEX, No. 21, by a Methodist minister.]

MR. EDITOR:—The queries of B. D. S. have puzzled good, wise and great men in all ages. "Can God plan and fail?" "Does God endeavor to draw men towards himself?" If God does not endeavor to draw men towards himself, he must be indifferent about them, or act repulsively so as to drive them from him. Good men of all ages have acted upon the most reasonable supposition that God was endeavoring to draw men to him; they have therefore striven to lay down their sins, and go to him submissively. They have acted upon the supposition that God's plan was to deal with man as a moral agent, and this scheme of Deity never will or can fail. If some are sinners, it is because they abuse the noble powers their God bestowed upon them. All right-minded men will admit that this is the most wise and prudent policy. Wicked men have acted otherwise. Opposed to duties and self-denial, they quibble thus:—"God is omnipotent. His plans can't fail. He is love, and must save all." But if it should be God's plan to damn eternally the finally impenitent, and if his love for moral order and good government should predominate over his love of the vile and wicked, what then? But to the questions.

Query 1st. "Some weeks ago, H. W. B. said in his Sunday evening's discourse, 'God endeavors to draw us towards him.' Now does not the word endeavor in that connection imply fallibility, and is it reasonable to suppose that the Omnipotent can plan and fail?"

Again, in concluding, he says:—"How can ministers preach that God is omniscient, omnipotent, and all love, if he, foreseeing a man is to be born who will choose sin and incur damnation, permits the birth?"

The two questions involve the same point.

Answer. The querist almost answers his own questions, when he says, "I have an innate consciousness that I can choose between good and evil." Then, sir, you are a moral agent. If you are a moral agent you cannot be forced in your actions. If you cannot be forced in your actions, you cannot be brought to God, except with your consent. Therefore God may be endeavoring to draw you to him by all means and appliances in accordance with your agency, of which you have "an innate consciousness."

The word endeavor in that connection does not imply fallibility, because God may have the power to force man's obedience by destroying his agency, but not the will to do it. He made men moral agents, because he wanted creatures with such power, subject to law, capable of vice and virtue. Now he will not undo his work,—force the creation he made free. So H. W. B. spoke correctly according to the Bible, man's constitution, and sound philosophy.

Query 2nd. "Last night he (H. W. B.) said,—'Christ died—blessed be God!—not to save the righteous, but sinners.' Were there any righteous until Christ died, according to orthodox teachings?"

Answer. Yes—millions of holy angels for whom Christ did not die, may be others, inhabitants of other worlds, who had never fallen. All our race are sinners. We may therefore say with great propriety, and we should say it with deep gratitude,—"Blessed be God, Christ died for sinners." H. W. B. was eminently right.

Query 3rd. "Then he laid great stress on,—'It is God which worketh in you, both to will, and to do, of his good pleasure'; and I say to myself,—'then, if God does not work in me, am I responsible for not doing his good pleasure?'"

Answer. No, sir; but the text affirms that he worketh in you both to will and to do. God worketh in you, that you may will what is good, and that you may do what is good. If he worketh in one, he worketh in all; else he is partial, which is absurd. He worketh in you "of his good pleasure,"—that is, as will suit his plans and economy of grace. He will only work in you so far as will incite you to good will and good action, and at the same time leave you in the full exercise of that agency of which you have an innate consciousness. You may say,—"He ought to do more,—force obedience, if he is omnipotent; prevent the birth, if he foresees that the child will abuse his agency and be damned eternally." But in so doing he would contradict himself by doing and undoing. Hence it is said in connection with the text—"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." O, sir, it is an awful responsibility to be a moral agent, with eternal Jehovah working in you, inciting you to will, as such, and to do, as such, and still by an exercise of your powers you may resist and sin and be justly punished.

Mr. Editor, I think I see the trouble with B. D. S. He is a gentleman of thought and refined sensibility; but he has never been converted. Come humbly and honestly to Christ, my dear B. D. S., and you will never again be heard quibbling about frightening sinners into doing good. Surely, every good man will say,—“if fear of punishment is an incentive to obedience, if it made us better boys at school and more obedient to our mothers at home,—then, for the sake of good morals, if nothing else, let it have its full force upon the vile heads of the wicked, who infest society and curse the earth.” If there be such a being as the Bible represents the devil to be, wholly evil, we might expect him to be slipping about among the vile, whispering—“God is love. He therefore wills to save you all. He is omnipotent, and what he wills can't fail. Therefore, don't be frightened out of your sins, into doing good.” But surely, my dear B. D. S., no man, having good morals in view, would so act.

VINDEX.

ELLAVILLE, GA., July 13, 1870.

A PLEA FOR NECESSITY.

DETROIT, July 1, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—Your answer in THE INDEX of the 25th of June to my letter on “Freedom and Necessity,” published in the same number, does not tend to narrow the issue, but to extend it rather, by raising argument upon questions of definition, and other matter which should be preliminary. To follow this lead faithfully is really to tune our instruments after the audience have assembled,—not fair to them, at least, though of course better than playing out of tune.

Possibly the fault is wholly due to the indefiniteness of statement in my former letter.

In what I have here to say, I will endeavor to clear the ground and help the argument by reducing the number of propositions.

In closing your answer, you say:—“The facts are on the side of spiritual freedom; it is certain speculations only (scarcely touched upon by our friend) that are on the side of necessity.” Now, my excuse for saying anything on this subject is the belief that the facts are not on the side of spiritual freedom, and that it is not “speculation only” that is on the side of necessity. I admit that speculation is on its side—very much on its side. For instance, it would greatly clear up the logic of the Freedom argument to show:—

1st. How anything caused can be free in any sense; or how, if not caused, it can be subject to law.

2d. How, if possessed by man, it can be free of its possessor; or how, if not possessed, man can be responsible for acts of its dictation.

3d. How, if it is not a mere expression of what the man is, the action it occasions can indicate the quality of the man; or how, if the quality lies back of the will, the will can be free, being, as it is, an invariable expression of this quality.

4th. How reconcile the fact that what a man wills to do is always taken as conclusive evidence of what he is at the time, if the will (or the man) is free to act differently at the time?

Why does he not act differently sufficiently often for men, from observation, to lose faith in this evidence? Can it be save for the reason that this so-called freedom has its law, its conditions, and that the conditions are the likes and dislikes of the man? Yet can the likes and dislikes be themselves produced by the will which they condition?

Either my desire to do an act causes me to will to do it (the desire calling the will into existence) and then the will is not free,—or the will causes both desire and act, and is free. But in the latter case what becomes of the man? That the will should under these circumstances act at all, is wholly unaccountable; and the man, if, while desiring to do one thing, he does another, might claim exemption from responsibility on the ground that a free something took possession of him.

If it is claimed that the free something is the man, I can but admit that this is the freest thing possible, yet in this case being underlies will and whatever being is will will be; that will is caused by it, varies with its every mood, is strong or weak as being loves much or little. We invariably think of will as a property of being; we speak of a man as having a strong will. Yet, if the will is free, it has him. If I possess a thing, it does as I wish. We will because we want, not want because we will.

The two chief arguments against necessity are, first, our consciousness, secondly, the consequences claimed as likely to follow from ceasing to believe in moral responsibility.

Now, I think I do but express your own conviction, when I say that the purest and wisest men are quite well aware that in them is no consciousness of merit or desert; but, on the other hand, that such an idea degrades the whole thought.

Emerson says,—“Not unto us,”—is the joyous and spontaneous utterance of the true soul. Is not this nearer the fact than any consciousness of how good I am, and how much I deserve?

As to the consequences of a disbelief in freedom, and therefore a disbelief in moral responsibility also, let me refer to your words in the fifth division of your answer.

You say,—“It is the peculiarity of Virtue to be the one creation of man.” This of itself presupposes that virtue must be radically unlike anything else in the universe to which he is related. I assume that he is enabled to create virtue by means of a will which is self-determining. That is, which acts from itself—its own cause—and that in the choice of the act man is free, and that, if he chooses rightly, he creates virtue. His conditions he cannot create by any action of the will; he is free only as to action within the conditions.

Now let us see. Love of virtue he does not create; yet it is impossible to show that any other reason for doing right is so good as a love of right, which love is not dependent on freedom.

The use of the word “love” recalls the latter part of your 5th division.

You say,—“The only moral growth we court is the continual strengthening of the love of right and hate of wrong, and the ever-increasing vigor of a will trained to do the one and avoid the other.” Now, I agree with all of this, only I would say that the “ever-increasing vigor” of the “trained will” would follow as a consequence, and that a trained will is not a free one, but an obedient, cultivated will, expressing the condition of the being at the time of willing, caused and determined by the condition of the being, or by the being, which the will could neither cause nor determine, but simply express. What trains the free will? That must be freer than it. Is the will susceptible of improvement? If so, how save by improving the intellect and desire of the being? Can the will depend upon things not free, yet be itself free?

To refer again to your words,—“The love of right and hate of wrong.” Now there is no freedom necessary here, yet I think there is the very element of virtue. Suppose we asked him whose freedom is imprisoned in this love of right and hate of wrong, if he could, at will, reverse the order, and love wrong and hate right. If he replied that he thought he could, we should at once doubt his virtue. If he is conscious of its impossibility, we are assured of his virtue; not only because of the absence of freedom, but from a conscious absence of it.

Do you say that, while his love and hate are not free, he has freedom of choice as to actions? While this is, I think, placing cause for effect and effect for cause, yet even this, if possible, would not help the case; since, if I do right while hating it and loving the wrong, my action is the result of some superior force and does not represent me, and is without virtue. No matter how good it may be to the object, it is no good of mine, unless my love go with it.

Further on, in division No. 5, you say,—“It is at our own option to be virtuous or vicious—it is not at our own option to be beautiful or ugly.” This seems to me a begging of the whole question.

The point of difficulty is here. The option (or choice) indicates a certain condition of the being making the choice, but does not make the condition. If we choose virtue, it is because we love virtue; our love of it is not a matter of choice, but determines our choice. We either love virtue or love it not, according to what we are, and choice does not cause this, but is caused by it. It is what all are that is primary. Our choice! Our will! Do they not both indicate simply and solely what we are? They do not make that which makes them. Neither does fact justify your statement; the morally ugly child develops into the morally ugly man with as great uniformity, as in the case of physical ugliness, and moral beauty in childhood becomes moral beauty in manhood and womanhood.

I know a little boy who is nervous, tender, passionate—who is so sympathetic that all sorrow is his sorrow. No one (indeed no thing) in his sight can suffer but he suffers. Is it optional with him into what he shall develop morally? I think not. The spiritual growth is finer and more complex than the physical, and the data for judgment less patent; but I see no reason for believing the law essentially different.

In answer to my first proposition, you say,—“Uniformity of growth presupposes a necessary law, whereas freedom would result in irregularity rather than uniformity of growth.” Now the trouble, as I understand it, is, that no general or moral growth is to be expected, if morals depend solely on freedom.

The fact that we predict anything of anything is because we believe it subject to law. If we find general tendencies in any direction, we are compelled to believe that something caused them.

Again, absolute necessity would no more produce uniformity in the moral world, than it does in the vegetable or brute creation. From the variety in the quality and size of trees we do not argue freedom.

In my second proposition noted in your answer, I meant to express what seems to me an inherent difficulty lying at the foundation of belief in freedom, namely, that it is of necessity an out-law,—that it is unrelated save from itself onward, not from itself backward; that in this it is unlike anything else conceivable by the human mind, neither can a reason for its action in any given case be offered, without destroying its distinctive character as free and at once assigning it to an order.

In the 3d division of your answer you say,—“Law with freedom suggests no impossibility to our mind, because we conceive freedom to exist only to a very limited extent.” While regretting that you do not state the limits, I am, I think, safe in saying that your argument requires belief in it to the extent that every act which has moral quality has it because the actor might at the time have done differently.

I find no limitation here, neither do I see how any limitation can exist in the power of choice and leave the will free. To be free if, is to be not free at all. To say “all are free to do what all want to do” at once transfers the argument from freedom of the will, to freedom of the want; and the question then is, are we free to want to do what we don't want to do? In a word, the will must underlie being and be self-acting, or it is not free. If it come second in the order, or is dependent on the quality of the (so-called) free being, then it is an agent and does as the principal dictates. If this difficulty is sought to be avoided by saying that the being is free, then all are involved in the inextricable confusion of arguing that, though originating the will from the wish, it can will to do what it wishes not to do. Without dwelling upon the difficulty of showing how this is possible, there is the yet more fatal difficulty, that to so act would be less free than that the being should forever do as it wished.

If that is done which I wish not done, it but adds to the bondage that the operator be myself.

In the 7th division of your answer, you say,—“there is more merit (that is, a higher title to respect) in the man who loves virtue so intensely that vice to him has no charms, than in the man who is distracted in his allegiance, and has to conquer the temptation to disloyalty by a severe battle with himself.”

This is, I think, an unusual definition of merit; it leaves out the distinctive quality given it by belief in freedom. It virtually says, the less temptation to do evil, the more merit for not doing it. Surely this is neither the technical nor popular definition. Take any illustration,—the most familiar. A reproaches B. with intemperance. B. excuses, by explaining the immense power the appetite for liquor has over him, that the sight or smell of it transforms him to a slave, and in the struggle it conquers, till the appetite is exhausted by gratification. A. replies that he knows nothing of such experiences, that liquor is rather repulsive to him than otherwise, but complacently adds that therefore sobriety is to him the more meritorious. Just the reverse of this is, I believe, the general meaning attached to the word merit.

To determine the meritorious quality of an act, the inquiry is, how strongly were you tempted to do otherwise? What gratification did you forego?

Therefore, I say, referring to the third division in your answer, “what you are” does not “depend on what you deserve.” That desert refers to the resistance of temptation, that the amount of temptation is the measure of the desert, and, note further, the temptation is also the measure of the imperfection of the one tempted. It is in this view that I say in a former letter “It is what I am, not what I deserve, that is of consequence.” Merit, if it could exist at all, would be the measure of our virtue, but in an inverse ratio. This is the contradiction, I think man reduced to by the advocates of Freedom.

To accept your parenthetical sentence, “a higher title to respect,” as a term convertible with “merit,” eliminates every distinctive logical and theological quality from the word.

Further on in this last division, you say,—“If the devils are in, is it not best to put them out?” Certainly this is my view; but if “merit” is the only “possible test of moral character,” then should you not let them remain that the man may be the more meritorious by resisting them?

I know you in so many words repudiate this definition of merit, but your argument requires it.

A few lines below the one quoted above, you refer to “an intense purpose to realize the ideal life.” Now this purpose, I think, we may call moral. Yet I do not find it free, nor apparently the result of freedom. The more intense the purpose, the more sure are we that the being having it can be nothing else, and the surer we are of this the more we love and admire. We do not ask, as a condition of our admiration and love, the possibility of this perpetual teetering on the balance of a double alternative. We ask rather that he be given over, body and soul, to the right beyond the chance of change. It is the fact of what he is doing, not the belief that he is free to do very much less, that is the ground of our admiration.

When Luther said before the Diet in the old cathedral at Worms,—“God help me! I can do no otherwise,”—we do not admire him the less because we believe absolutely the truth of his statement.

Let us analyze a little further this question. You say, no morals without freedom—the freedom of choice—the freedom to choose either of two, or any one of many alternatives. In the fact of freedom there is no morals, but the fact renders moral action possible. Then being so conditioned, if I choose the right, I create virtue, not because what I choose is right, but because I might have chosen wrongly. This is, I suppose, a fair statement of the position. Now I claim that the choosing of the right is the whole of the matter, and the less able you are by temperament, education and love to do otherwise, the better; yet there is no meritorious action if the will but directs that done which is an intense gratification for us to do. Neither is the presence or absence, in this case, of freedom of any importance whatever, since it could in no way alter the action for the better, or give a better motive for acting. Yet here, in this first supposed illustration of man's exercise of the wonderful power which he has by virtue of spiritual freedom, the power to create, we find it difficult to see in what way freedom has anything to do with it. Here at least the actor may be absolutely obliged to do right, provided it is his own love of right that compels; yet if compelled, there is no freedom, and, if right, none is needed. Still there is what we call virtue; and it would seem, in this case, the less freedom the more virtue. That such a view has even the appearance of truth throws serious doubt upon the theory that man really creates anything.

I see no virtue save love of right, no vice save love of wrong, and no merit and no demerit in either; but great good fortune in the one, and great bad fortune in the other. Why? Because the one conserves what is most worth saying, while the other at least postpones it. That it does so is an ultimate fact. If you ask how right and how wrong, when we are unable to do otherwise, I can only answer that the one tends to the happiness of the actor, and to order, and the happiness of all, and the other to the reverse in each of these particulars, and that therefore we call them right and wrong. But if the knowledge of their quality be an intuition, action under it is none the less irreconcilable with freedom.

PERSONAL.

Our good friend, William H. Channing, sailed from New York on the 16th inst. for England, his present home, after a visit of eight months, filled with useful labors, in this his native country. Mr. Channing, during his visit, has been greatly interested in the free religious movement, and has done excellent service for it. His lectures at the Lowell Institute, in Boston, and in other places, on the Ancient Civilizations and Religions, his addresses at various public meetings, religious and reformatory, his attendance and talk at the Boston Radical Club, his speech at the late annual meeting of our Association, have all manifested his enthusiastic sympathy with the principles which the Association represents. He made himself a member of the Association and desired to be known as such. Mr. Channing is one of the Broad-churchmen of the Unitarian denomination, for we suppose he would still call himself a Unitarian Christian. But he labors for the freest inquiry and the largest fellowship; and though he sees now a use in these denominational and specific religious names, he freely confesses, if we have understood him aright, that there is no reason why the universal church of the future should be called Christian. We venture to quote the following sentences from a private letter received from him the day he sailed from New York:—"Depend upon me, entirely, for all the help in my power, to advance the world-wide movement for the 'Church of Universal Unity.' That is the positive name for the organization of all free children of God into one family; which shall be, if not to-day, then to-morrow. And so with hearty best wishes I am yours in good hope."

THE CHINESE AGAIN.

We alluded last week to some aspects of the Chinese question which is now attracting universal attention in this country, and quoted a part of Senator Sumner's earnest plea for justice to this new class of immigrants. The argument which the opponents of Chinese immigration use most skilfully is their representation of the present method by which the Chinese are brought here as a "Coolie system;" as the introduction of a class of servile laborers so bound by contract that their condition is little above that of slaves. This is a matter which should certainly be thoroughly investigated. And should it be discovered that the present process of Chinese immigration is of such a character, it should be broken up by law. There should be, and probably would be, no division of opinion on that point. But it is a question whether the contract-system, by which the Chinamen are being brought to this country, can properly be thus characterized, and whether the cry against it is not a species of demagoguism to cover some less defensible form of hostility to the Mongolian in America. A well-informed writer in the Boston Advertiser, a merchant for a number of years in San Francisco, thus speaks on this question:—

First, as to the social position of the majority of the Chinese emigrants. They are the poor of that great nation, they are not slaves—no, not even coolies. This has been often explained by the intelligent and educated Chinese, and by others of their American friends; but yet it is constantly brought up against them that they are coolie-slaves, "imported" by cruel task-masters who receive the greater part of their wages, and that they leave their families in pawn as security for their fidelity. A leading republican newspaper, whose views of the question are sound, recently fell into the mistake of acknowledging this latter as a lamentable fact.

Such allegations have their only foundation in the minds of unscrupulous demagogues appealing to the prejudices of the ignorant and narrow-minded portion of the community. The Chinaman is not like the Yankee, or indeed like any of the Circassian race; his love of country, of domestic ties, and the interest his family ever retain in him prevent him from throwing himself upon the world, outside the Middle Kingdom, with no guarantee for his support while living, or his return to the shades of his ancestors if death interposes. The American will start tomorrow for any new quarter of the globe, if there may be found sufficient bait for his acquisitiveness upon arrival; he never asks how he shall get home again, he does not even pause to inquire what will be his fate if the spoil is all divided ere he reach the golden shore; the world is wide, and in a certain sense it is all alike to him. Not so the Chinaman, he wants to know where he is going, how many of his nationality are there, how long he must stay, what will be his wages when there, what provision will be made for him in case of sickness, death, or desire to return. This has led to the richer class of Chinese the merchants and capitalists, forming sort of Mutual Insurance Societies for the benefit of the poor; knowing their countrymen so well, they know how to assist them to come here, and aid them when in a strange land.

A very commendable system it would appear to a disinterested mind. But these companies do not do this for nothing, says some one ironically. No; and do our insurance companies? Do the capitalists who guarantee us against loss by fire, or by accident, who protect our families from want and our ships from the consequence of disaster, do they do it all from motives of pure benevolence?

Mr. Fung Tang of San Francisco, as intelligent and public-spirited a merchant as ever did business; a man whom Mr. A. T. Stewart of New York has been proud to honor, said in explanation of this system: "These people are not slaves; they are very poor; without our aid they could not come here; they arrive in debt for their passage money, and we have to provide for them at once; when they get work they pay off the money which we have loaned them." I do not use his exact words, but as near as I can recollect I have expressed his meaning. Here, however, is more lengthy explanation from a letter indited by the Chinese merchants in San Francisco to Governor Bigler in 1852. After telling how they procured their passage, this letter says:—

"These arrangements made at home, seldom bring them further than San Francisco, and here the Chinese traders furnish them the means of getting to the mines. A great deal of money is thus lent at a nominal or very low interest, which to the credit of our countrymen we are able to say is almost invariably repaid. The poor Chinaman does not come here as a slave; he comes because of his desire for independence, and he is assisted by the charity of his countryman, which they bestow on him safely because he is industrious and honestly repays them."

A word more on the constantly-repeated term "coolies." Perhaps nothing I can say will better explain it than the following extract from the letter above referred to:—

"You speak of Chinamen as 'coolies,' and in one sense the word is applicable to a great many of them, but not in that in which you seem to use it. 'Cooly' is not a Chinese word; it has been imported into China from foreign parts, as it has been into this country. What its original signification was we do not know; but with us it means a common laborer and nothing more. We have never known it used among us as a designation of a class such as you have in view; persons bound to labor under contracts which they are forcibly compelled to comply with. The Irishmen who are engaged in digging down your hills, the men who unload ships, who clean your streets, or even drive your drays, would, if they were in China, be considered 'coolies;' tradesmen, mechanics of every kind, and professional men, would not. None of us are 'coolies,' if by that word you mean bond men or contract slaves. The other matter which you allude to, their leaving their families in pledge as security for the performance of their contract is inconsistent with their character and absurd. Have you ever inquired what the holder of such a pledge could do with them? If he used any force toward them he would be guilty of an offence, and be punished by the laws just as in any other country. And if he treated them well, they would only be a burden and an additional expense to him."

This apparently fair letter to the Advertiser concludes with the following testimony to the good character of the Chinese in California:

I can wish your merchants no better fortune than the privilege of dealing some day in person with the mercantile class of China, as I have found them to be in San Francisco. I have done business with them constantly when in that city, have stored their cargoes, have shipped for them wheat and oats, have sold them for shipment many hundreds of tons of flour, and I never knew one of them to violate his engagements in any way; such is the universal testimony of every one doing business with them. It is a common saying among their American friends that they would rather have as security the word of a Chinese merchant than the pledge, written, sworn to and witnessed, of many of Circassian blood. Certainly their unswerving integrity and strict honesty, to say nothing of their other virtues, may put to the blush our boasted civilization, in these days of frequent "irregularities," fraudulent and shameless "failures," and alarming "defalcations."

NOTICE—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOCK, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

Dr. Ray Palmer tells this "evangelical" anecdote: A western mother, who, by-the-way, is well known as an authoress, told him that her son, whom she had advised to unite with the church, had a difficulty. "I don't see, mother, the great merit in Christ's dying for us. If I could save a dozen men by dying for them, I think I would; much more if there were millions of them." "But, my son, would you die for a dozen grasshoppers?" That set him thinking. After a few days he came to her with his doubts cleared. "I don't know about the grasshoppers; they are a pretty clever kind of bug. But if it was millions of mosquitoes, I think I should let them die!"

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

[The first Free Lecture in City Hall, Dover, N. H., Nov. 15, 1868. The following explanatory note, introducing the lecture, was read to the audience.]

Before entering on the subject of the evening's lecture, I wish to state distinctly how and why I am here. In the record of proceedings of the City Council last week (published in the Dover Gazette of Nov. 13), I find this vote mentioned among others:—

"Voted, to grant the use of the Hall to the Independent Society, Rev. Mr. Abbot, for religious services Sunday evenings."

This may have given to some persons a wrong impression. Since I resigned my position as preacher to the Independent Society, I have formed no new engagement with it, nor do I even know whether that Society still exists as such or not. Individual friends have subscribed a paper requesting from the City Council the use of this Hall on the same terms granted to the Free-will Baptist Society; and have also subscribed another paper pledging something for defraying the expenses involved. The only agreement I have made is this, that, provided my friends will pay for the Hall, I will lecture in it on Sunday evenings when I have no engagements elsewhere, and am not otherwise prevented. For these occasional lectures I ask no compensation but the thoughtful and unprejudiced attention of the few or many who may come to hear me.

At the threshold of the subject before us this evening lie two questions,—1st, what is Freedom? 2d, what is Religious Freedom? Let me answer these questions as clearly and as tersely as I can.

Freedom is Opportunity,—an open field in which to run the race of life,—a fair chance to develop the nature we are born with, and bring it to the highest possible point of beauty and usefulness. Whatever thwarts the divine ends of Nature, and forces us into any unnatural development of any kind, enslaves us; and freedom is the abolition of all thwarting influences. "Hands off—give free play to Nature!" That is the essential word of freedom in all ages, the instinctive, inevitable aspiration of every noble spirit.

Religious Freedom is Religious Opportunity,—a fair chance to grow into divine character under the common sunshine and the common rains of God,—an unobstructed path to truth and goodness, an unquestioned right to seek, each in his own way, oneness with the One who is infinitely true and good. "Lift off the millstone of your institutions!" cries the soul to society, "forbear your Chinese foot-dwarfing, and your Flathead Indian skull-compression, and let me grow peacefully into perfect communion with God!" He is spiritually free who has ample space to develop according to the Divine idea of his being,—to use the faculties given him in natural ways, and by their use to work out his destiny uncoerced by man. Whoever believes in spiritual liberty as right or safe must, if his belief is at all intelligent, also believe that the human spirit can be trusted with the helm of its own barque in its voyage over the seas of time. The right, therefore, of religious freedom, is simply the right of every soul to complete self-mastery,—the right to think, speak, and act, in all places and at all times, according to the dictates of natural reason and natural conscience.

There are three chief aspects in which I propose briefly to consider religious freedom, namely, its civil or political aspect, its social aspect, and its individual or private aspect. In other words, I wish to speak of it with reference to the organic law of the State, with reference to unorganized public opinion, and with reference to the individual soul.

1. It has recently been voted, as you all know, by the people of New Hampshire, to call a public convention for the purpose of revising the State Constitution. Among other amendments, it is proposed to abolish what is known as the "religious test." As they now read, Articles XIV, XXIX, and XLII make it a necessary qualification of the Governor, members of the Senate, and members of the House of Representatives, that they shall "be of the Protestant religion." This qualification it is now proposed to omit, and thus render all good men equally eligible to these offices without regard to their religion. That this change will be both just and wise, no one but a bigot will deny; and it is a sign of the increasing liberality of the people that such a change is contemplated. So long as any part of the population are disqualified for office because of their honest convictions of truth,—so long as Catholics, or Jews, or any others who may not choose to avow themselves Protestants, are placed under the ban, and refused privileges under the laws granted to those of a different faith,—there is a manifest violation of human rights, and especially of the right of religious freedom. For such a restriction as this, making invidious discriminations among the people on account of differences of opinion which in nowise affect the well-being of the State, subjects all those of the proscribed classes to undeserved humiliation in the presence of their fellow-men, tends to impair that sense of self-respect which is vital to a manly character, and thus to some extent checks their natural religious development. I believe, quite as much as any one, that the principles of the Roman Catholic Church are in every way hostile to freedom and progress; but I have no sympathy with those who wish to "fight the Devil with fire," and would protect the public against the evils of Romanism, not by disqualifying Romanists for office, but by so thoroughly instructing the people in the principles of freedom that Romanists, even if in office, would have no power for mischief. The present policy of intolerance protects the State at the expense of justice and freedom; the true policy of universal religious equality will equally well protect the State, and yet not infringe upon the rights of any. Therefore I hope most earnestly that the people of New Hampshire will abolish the present injurious test of office.

How far it is designed to carry the reform of the Constitution in this direction, I do not know; but the work will not be fully done if it stops here. Article VI of the Bill of Rights authorizes only "the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality;" and by implication, therefore, it forbids the support of any but "Protestant teachers." As the Bill of Rights now stands, it is in this respect a Bill of Wrongs; for it practically forbids the support of a Roman Catholic priest, or a Jewish Rabbi. In fact, it forbids my friends to support me as a "public teacher;" for, if questioned whether I regard myself as a "Protestant" in the plain meaning of the Article, I should certainly say,—No." If the word "Protestant" means all who protest against the authority of the Romish Church, then I am, of course, a Protestant, and so is every Jew, Mahometan, Parsee, or even atheist. But that is not the common meaning of the word, nor the meaning of Article VI of the Bill of Rights. Fairly interpreted, the word "Protestant" covers only those Christians who protest against the authority of the Romish Church; and in this sense I am not a Protestant. In fact, I am a Protestant in no sense in which a Jew is not equally a Protestant; and hence I believe that the Sixth Article of the Bill of Rights virtually forbids any body of men to support me as a public teacher of religion. But this prohibition is unjust, and probably no man, however bigoted, would dare attempt to enforce it. It is, at any rate, a prohibition I should certainly disregard, and then take the consequences, be they what they might. If the proposed reform is to be thorough, this prohibition will be repealed by striking out the word "Protestant" wherever it occurs in the Constitution.

Not only in the Constitution, but also in the Statutes, of the State of New Hampshire, are there infringements of religious freedom. I will mention two. Chapter CCLV, Sect. I, forbids any person openly to "deny the being of a God," on penalty of paying a fine of two hundred dollars. According to this statute, an honest, upright atheist, in nowise disturbing the public peace, is forbidden, even if seated quietly in his own parlor, and conversing confidentially with his friends, to express his sincere conviction; the law gags him in his own house. Now if I believe anything, I think I believe reverently in God; and if I believe that anything could do a dreadful and lasting injury to society, I believe that the universal prevalence of atheism would do it. But, nevertheless, I look on that statute, and the spirit which framed it, with inexpressible abhorrence and contempt. It tramples on the dearest right of every earnest soul, the right of expressing to others its innermost convictions; and it is thus guilty of most flagrant injustice. It betrays a fatal distrust of the power of truth to prevail over error, a nervous alarm lest the wayward speculations of a few shall overthrow the deep foundations of religion; and it is thus practically guilty of the very atheism it condemns. If we really believe that God exists, shall we fear that some indiscreet atheist may talk him out of existence? Or shall we think that we provide better for the welfare of the community by putting the padlock on men's mouths, than by conceding to all the freedom of speech we claim for ourselves? To me, there is no atheism so fatal as despair of human nature, despair of the invincibility of truth in the long run, despair of the safety of perfect freedom as the ground-principle of human society. I say, therefore, that this statute, punishing with a fine the expression of honest thought, strikes a deadlier blow at the well-being of mankind than the arguments or assertions of a million atheists. Well says John Stuart Mill,—"Truth gains more even by the errors of one who, with due study and preparation, thinks for himself, than by the true opinions of those who only hold them because they do not suffer themselves to think." The State has no right to punish supposed offences against religion,—it has no right to punish any offences except those against itself, that is, against the public peace.

I will mention one more instance of the meddling interference of the State in matters of conscience. Chapter CCLV, Sections 3 and 5, enacts certain Sunday laws, and, among other prohibitions, forbids "any person to use any play, game, or recreation on that day or any part thereof." Suppose a man believes, as many men believe now, and as I believe myself, that Sunday is just as sacred as Monday or Tuesday, and no more so,—that games of recreation are innocent and beneficial, when not carried to excess,—and that what is innocent and beneficial on Monday or Tuesday is just as much so on Sunday,—by what right does the State crack its whip over his head, and say,—"If you obey your own conscience in this matter rather than mine, and play a game of checkers or euchre on Sunday, even in your own house, you shall be fined from one to six dollars?" By what right, I say, does the State pass any law punishing a peaceable man for that which injures no one else? It is by no right but that of might, that such laws are enacted. It is preposterous to talk of religious freedom, where such laws are enforced; and, if not enforced, they ought to be repealed.

2. But even supposing that the State comprehended the just limits of its own jurisdiction, and forbore to enact any statute violating the spiritual liberty of the individual, it would by no means follow that the individual would be left spiritually free. Society has other ways of oppressing the individual than the way of legal oppression. The whole force of public law comes from that public opinion out of which the law grows; and this mighty public opinion often acts with terrible energy in crushing the individual without expressing itself in definite statutes. This tremendous power of public opinion is often turned into an engine of spiritual tyranny by those who are able to mould it to suit their own purposes. The most melancholy and disastrous result of this abuse of power is, that too frequently the victims of it are but half conscious of their own wrongs or degradation. There is nothing visible to point at, nothing tangible to lay hold of, as evidence of coercion; but the wind of public opinion often blows helplessly before it the feeble vessels that know not how to sail against it. Why is it, that, without the fear of any prohibitory statute before their eyes, so many men walk the streets with gags in their mouths? To one who looks with sharp and discerning vision, half the population, and more than half, wear chains about their necks, one end of which lies in the hand of that stern and watchful master, Public Opinion. Muzzled securely, and held fast by the leash, are they men, or dogs in human shape? Biped man not seldom exhibits a quadruped nature. Subserviency to the popular whims, dread of what the world will say, inability to act counter to the commands of Mrs. Grundy, is written out so plainly in the whole air, manner, and expression of some good people I meet, that I can hardly forbear giving utterance to the pity I feel. Many an opinion has been expressed to me in private which the speaker knew, and I knew, he would not for worlds drop into the greedy ear of the public. Men do not dare to speak frankly their real thoughts, do not dare to act out the suggestions of their own good sense, do not dare to be really masters of their own souls; and they surrender up the reins of conduct to the strong but invisible hand of public opinion.

This potent influence is skilfully made use of by the leaders of parties, both in politics and religion, for the enslavement of multitudes who have little or no real sympathy with the party objects. If every man in this community were free to follow out his private thought to its logical result in open action, we should all be amazed. Party lines would become strangely mixed, and, I fear, some of the churches would have few besides women left in the pews. It is scarcely suspected, by those who have not carefully observed, how many persons are really coerced into church membership and church support by the stress of public opinion. It is respectable to be evangelical, it is respectable to belong to prosperous churches, it is respectable to conform to the superstitions of society; and many men who in their souls loathe the bondage they are in, yet wear their fetters without an effort to be free. Fear of social disgrace from staying away, and expectation of increased patronage in business from going, have quite as much to do with filling the churches as sincere conviction of the value of the church services. The influence of sect is often designedly brought to bear on these unworthy motives, and men are unblushingly invited to join this or that society because it is the largest, or the most fashionable, or the most zealous in patronizing its own members in their various branches of business.

In a thousand such ways, public opinion is made to capture men by the wholesale, and drag into its net all who are not strong enough to burst through its flimsy meshes. The childish imbecilities so gravely announced from so many pulpits as divine truth are by no means believed to-day as they once were; the common sense of mankind is shaking itself free from the leading-strings of theology; yet men still mechanically sustain that very public opinion which in return makes slaves of them. Hence I say that society in many ways overbears the independence of the private soul, and, without needing to enact laws for its enslavement, often reduces it to a most degrading slavery, of which it is, perhaps, only half-conscious. Not until society shall be permeated and saturated with the profoundest reverence for the private reason and private conscience, will public opinion become an emancipating rather than an enslaving influence.

3. But even were society wholly to respect the spiritual liberty of the individual, and neither by formal enactment nor by informal public opinion to interfere with its sacred rights, still it would be possible for the soul voluntarily to enslave itself. It is sad to see how rare among men is the manly determination to govern conduct by private conscience and reason, dealing bravely and sincerely with each case of duty on its own merits, and looking neither to the right hand nor the left to see what others will say. Ninetenths, nay, ninety-nine hundredths, of mankind, settle cases of doubtful duty by reference to some standard outside their own breasts. Even if they mean to do right at all costs, they too seldom trust their own divine instincts and faculties, but look to some authority above them (or perhaps below them) for a solution of the problem. It is true, enslavement by an external standard of goodness is infinitely better than enslavement by their own passions or selfish interests; but it is also infinitely worse than the conscious regulation of life by the inward law, and the conscious discrimination between truth and error by the inward light. Especially in religion is it essential to keep a manly attitude, and avoid the whining, pitiful, abject crawling in the dust which too often passes for "pious submission to the will of God." I take that to be the will of God which my own soul sees to be true and right. I find it in no book, though it be the Bible,—in no institution, though it be the Church,—in no leader or Lord, though it be the Christ. No, I find the will of God made known to me in my own soul by the natural use of my own faculties, so long as I cherish a pure and single purpose. It is for the child to govern himself by the will of his parents; it is for man to govern himself by his own will, taking care to govern this by conscience and reason, and in doing this he stands the best possible chance of obeying the will of God.

This grave, stern, self-reliant government of conduct by inward principles of action is the mark of true manhood. We cannot afford to trust the soul's affairs to any vicarious management. Here appears the want of adaptation between Christianity and adult humanity; for the abnegation of the will which Christianity requires is precisely that which the mature spirit cannot make. "Take my yoke upon you," says Jesus; "my yoke is easy and my burden is light." If it were possible, in the nature of things, for a soul that has come to the full consciousness of its own supreme control over itself, to wear any yoke at all, it would surely be the yoke of Jesus; no yoke, surely, would be easier to wear. But the free soul cannot wear a yoke. It must, on peril of enslavement, accept the arduous task of self-guidance, and refuse steadfastly to surrender the jewel of liberty. It is God within us, speaking through our natural faculties, that must command our action,—not Jesus, without us, speaking through musty records of antiquity.

It is no spirit of defiant or churlish hostility to the great Teacher of Judæa, that bids me refuse to wear the yoke he offers with such gracious words; it is no presumptuous belief in my heart that I am as good or pure as he—God forbid it!—that bids me stand erect in his august presence. Far from it. But though at his side I seem to myself to be like a puny hillock beside Mt. Washington, I have come to comprehend that hill and mountain must each stand on its own base, and obey equally the same great law which holds them both to the solid earth. Spiritual freedom is the first and chief condition of noble character; and when Christianity demands of me that I lay this crown of humanity at the feet of its regal Christ,—when it demands of me unconditional surrender of manly independence, and unconditional submission to a spiritual Lord and King,—then I see that to be a Christian is to be less than a Man; and, declining to bow my neck even to a golden yoke, I make my choice, not in Christianity, but in simple, natural Manhood. This being clear to me, that Christianity is incompatible with spiritual freedom, I choose freedom, and not Christianity. Whether to you freedom or Christianity is the greater good, judge freely for yourselves!

A vivid idea of the weakness of chicken soup was conveyed in a wag's query to his wife at dinner; "Can't you coax that chicken to wade through the soup once more?"

THE BAPTISTS AND THE LATE CHARLES DICKENS.

[From the Boston Evening Transcript.]

The announcement that, at the regular weekly meeting of the Baptist ministers of Boston and vicinity, some notice would be taken of "certain recent eulogies on the distinguished dead," brought an unusual number of the clergy of that denomination to Social Hall, Tremont Temple, this forenoon. Rev. Theron Brown presided.

Rev. J. D. Fulton opened the subject by introducing the following preamble and resolution:—

Whereas, The tendency is manifest on every hand to ignore the plain teachings of the Word of God regarding the penalty attached to sin, which causes many of our Evangelical ministers to declare that popular and talented men find in death a release from sin and welcome to the joys of heaven, though they lived without God and hope in the world,—

Resolved, That the Baptist ministers of Boston and vicinity feel it to be their duty to stand by the truths committed to their keeping, even though godless worldlings are compelled to feel that their former companions have rejected the gospel, are suffering the penalties of a violated law, the wrath of an avenging God.

Mr. Fulton supported his resolution in a brief and characteristic speech.

Rev. Dr. Neale, in rising to oppose the resolution, expressed his regret that the subject had been introduced into the meeting at all. He thought the resolution was a reflection on ministers of other denominations who had expressed their opinions in their own way, and among them Mr. Murray of the Park Street Church, with whose expressions the Baptists had nothing to do. He preferred that these gentlemen should be dealt with by their own denominations.

Rev. Dr. Murdock had not a word to say for Charles Dickens; but he did not want to be called upon to indorse Mr. Fulton in what he considered a palpable mistake, in his allusion to the private and domestic life of Charles Dickens, with which he did not think Mr. Fulton was any more familiar than he himself was. He was always ready to support his brother (Fulton) in his utterances of the truth, as given by his Lord and Master.

Rev. Dr. Peck was of the opinion that the resolution before the meeting "out-Fulton'd Fulton." He was a Calvinist, had preached, and, if he should preach again, would preach Calvinism; but did not believe in indulging in personalities to urge his doctrine.

Rev. Dr. Mason, of Cambridge, thought that, if Mr. Fulton had let Dickens alone, he would have stood better. If he (Mason) had resolved to preach a sermon on the injurious tendencies of novel reading, he should have used different language in his pulpit than that attributed to Messrs. Dunn or Fulton. It was true, he said, that he, in common with all Baptists, believed that, if a man died without acknowledging God, he was damned; but it was not in human power to affirm what was the condition of a man after his decease.

Rev. Mr. Gordon, of the Clarendon Street Church, was astonished that ministers should have had anything to say about a man who did not belong to any church, and he did not think that the resolution was needed to tone up the ministry.

Rev. H. C. Townley, of Woburn, thought the subject a proper one for consideration in the pulpits, for the reason that there had come to be a general feeling outside of the churches that a man's smartness insured him heaven when he died. He considered Mr. Murray's assertion that death sent a man to heaven nothing better than heterodoxy, though spoken from an orthodox pulpit.

Rev. Dr. Child said that, when Mr. Dickens died, the Unitarian and Universalist pulpits eulogized him, as did also the press generally, as a public benefactor. The press he considered one of the greatest of the public educators, whose influences should be counteracted from Baptist pulpits by judicious utterances in a general way, when they were at variance with Baptist belief. Messrs. Fulton and Dunn had brought the press down upon them by what they had said of Mr. Dickens's life. To illustrate his idea of the tendency of the age, Dr. Child remarked that he once broke the Sabbath by listening to Dr. Miner, who uttered a truth when he stated in his anniversary sermon that, though Universalist churches did not appear to increase numerically, their increased influence was apparent in Evangelical pulpits, where doctrine was not so strongly preached as in former days. Dr. Child closed by stating that the idea has obtained in the public mind that Evangelical ministers were afraid.

Dr. Murdock then offered the following resolution as a substitute for Mr. Fulton's:—

Resolved, That we hereby reaffirm our unshaken belief in the scriptural doctrine of the future and final retribution of all who die in impenitence and unbelief.

Dr. Mason suggested "eternal" in place of "final." Mr. Fulton wanted his preamble retained.

Dr. Mason did not want it retained, for the manifest reason that it was untrue.

Mr. Fulton said he would yet find it true.

Rev. Dr. Eddy did not like the last resolve. It was unnecessary, and if it was adopted he should move to take up the New Hampshire articles of faith one by one. It would be inferred that Baptists were breaking from the doctrines of the fathers.

Mr. Fulton said he was surprised at what Dr. Murdock had said of his knowledge of Charles Dickens's private life. He (Fulton) stated that he knew Mr. Dickens started "All the Year Round" to publish to the world a defence of himself and his domestic difficulties, which the publishers of the periodical with which he was formerly connected would not admit into their columns. Mr. Fulton re-asserted what he claimed was patent, that Mr. Dickens lived with his wife's sister because his conduct with his sister-in-law was such that his wife could not live with him.

Mr. Fulton closed by stating that he did not expect to secure the friendship of his enemies in Boston. He gave up the idea of being popular here from the first. He had preached "hell" in the city until he had obtained there a foothold for the cross of Christ. When he first came to Boston, he said, scarcely a person would kneel when he prayed; now kneeling was a marked feature where he made his appeals. He would not prove recreant to Christ's trust in him to secure any man's favor. He meant to put his views of Dickens on record, and cared not whether he was supported or the contrary.

Dr. Murdock again pressed his resolution with slight verbal amendments at the suggestion of Dr. Mason.

Dr. Peck wanted an addition made to secure the liberty of the pulpit.

Dr. Mason wanted both resolutions referred to Drs. Neale and Murdock, to report hereafter.

Rev. Mr. Garner, of Charles street, asked why the doctrine should be reaffirmed. He professed to hold all, right straight through. The reporters were present, and would publish the discussion, and he wanted no flinching.

Rev. Mr. Warren, of Bowdoin square, said that, if any one doubted Mr. Murray's Orthodoxy, he would give evidence that at his ordination he came as squarely on to the Orthodox platform of faith as any minister he ever knew. He did not believe in abridging the liberty of the pulpit, and was in favor of Mr. Fulton preaching what he thought proper on his own rostrum. God will sustain his preachers; men need not.

Dr. Eddy said Messrs. Dunn and Fulton should have the thanks of all Evangelists for their spirit; but if the Baptists should undertake to denounce Mr. Murray, that gentleman would only laugh at them from his seat in Park street pulpit. He moved that the subject be laid upon the table,—a motion that had repeatedly been made indirectly before, but had not been noticed by the moderator.

The motion was put and declared carried. Mr. Fulton doubted the vote, and a committee was appointed to make a count as the voters arose in their seats. One of the members asked Mr. Fulton to satisfy himself by counting the yeas. He replied that he "didn't want to look at them." The result was 30 to 10, and the subject was supposed to be tabled.

But Dr. Murdock did not think his resolution was included, but was of the opinion that the motion referred to Mr. Fulton's resolution only, and he was supported by the meeting.

Rev. Dr. Lorimer, of Shawmut Avenue, put in another resolution, which was not received.

Mr. Fulton thought the Baptists were changing their views, and falling into line with the heterodoxy of other orthodox pulpits. [Hissses.] "If the brethren will bear it, I will not," he remarked, excitedly.

Dr. Neale thought Dr. Murdock's resolution was not enough—it was too bald, and moved that Drs. Murdock and Mason be empowered to consider the resolution and report hereafter.

Rev. Mr. Eaton moved that the resolution be laid on the table. Lost.

Rev. Mr. Fulton said: "Let's go ahead."

Dr. Mason considered that the denomination had been placed in a false position by this meeting, and advised the brothers to get out of the fix the best way they could. He indulged in a little pleasantry with Mr. Fulton, which was relished by the meeting, but hardly by the gentleman to whom it was directed.

Mr. Fulton remarked that the meeting made a mistake if it was afraid now; but if Dr. Murdock's resolution was intended to support him (Fulton), he advised the brothers to vote it down.

Dr. Murdock then changed and added to his resolution, and it was put as follows:—

Resolved, That we hereby reaffirm our unshaken belief in the scriptural doctrine of the future punishment of all who die in impenitence and unbelief; and that we also reaffirm the liberty of the pulpit in all matters of Christian utterance.

Before the question was decided, however, a motion was made to adjourn, which resulted in a tie, and the moderator decided in favor of continuing in session.

In the confusion that followed, Rev. Mr. Kelton availed himself of the situation to introduce a resolve to the effect that "the position of the Baptist pulpit of Boston and vicinity does not require any reaffirmation of principles."

This also was lost, not by a direct vote upon it, but in a resolve to adjourn by a large majority.

Thus ended one of the most irregular meetings, in a parliamentary sense, ever held in Boston.

FULTON'S ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

[By "Warrington" in the Springfield Republican.]

Of course you have seen and relished the full report of Fulton's speech at the meeting of Baptist Ministers, called to settle the question whether Rev. Mr. Murray was acting according to evangelical ideas in saying a good word for Charles Dickens, and, as a corollary, whether Fulton and Dunn were justified in sending the novelist to hell, as you know they did so recently, and with self-sufficient unction. Incidents to this question was the one whether the novelist aforesaid was really undergoing the punishment appointed for all men who satirize the clergy and drink wine. The meeting did not decide the last question, Dr. Murdock's suggestion that it be left to the Almighty "with full powers" being considered a wise one by all except Fulton, who has no idea of leaving such matters to the Almighty, at any rate without his aid in the shape of advice. At first thought it seems sad that Dickens cannot read the proceedings of this meeting, especially Fulton's speech. But, after all, the wonderful humorist knew Fulton intimately; as Shakespeare knew all the Dogberries, all the Cades, all the Touchstones, all the Pistols, all the Fluellons, all the Gobbsos, that had gone before or would come after him, so did Dickens know Fulton. The primal ass involves, includes, prophesies, all asses, from the creation downward or upward. Dr. Murdock, Dr. Neale, Dr. Eddy, and the rest, though provoked, no doubt, at being put into such a position, must have secretly enjoyed the meeting, and especially Fulton's speech. Who could have helped enjoying it? Satire pales its ineffectual fires before such sublime reality. Do you know that I claim to have been the first discoverer of Fulton? And I flatter myself that I have brought him out. Nothing in his discussions on the woman question has at all equalled his scintillations since Dickens died. He seems to be conscious that he has a genius for donkeyhood which nobody else approaches. The Journal, you observe, has at last reported him. Col. Roger's edict that his name should not be printed in that paper has been at last disregarded. No newspaper can afford to ignore Fulton. He is an institution which must henceforward be acknowledged. Isn't it a little odd, by the way, that his demonstration is so coincident in point of time with the poor old pope's assumption of infallibility? You are reminded a little of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, although Fulton is not a follower of Pius the Ninth. Not he. He is an opposition Pope. He keeps the shop over the way. He shows up the pope every other week, alternating him with Dickens. He is not so powerful, however, as the Roman pope. The latter sets all Europe at loggerheads; Fulton only sets all America into fits of inextinguishable laughter. Everybody was on the broad grin yesterday and the day before. "Ho! ho! Look here, old fellow, have you seen the Advertiser?" "What? Oh, yes, Fulton! Haw! haw! haw!" One man stumbles against another, nearly knocking him down, and as he begs pardon bursts out laughing—"Excuse me, sir, but I was thinking of Fulton; seen the report of his speech?" "Oh, yes, very funny; no consequence, sir. Good morning!" "Hollo! Come in here! Want to show you something." "What's that? Oh, I know—Fulton! Good gracious, don't you suppose I've seen that? Ho! ho! ho!" And so it went up and down the streets. I doubt whether Pickwick himself ever made people as good-natured. As Dickens' death "eclipsed the gayety of nations," so Fulton's exploits eclipsed the sun itself. Heat was forgotten, the soda shops neglected, and men were as willing to wear thick clothes as thin ones. It was "all along" of Fulton and his ecumenical council that Boston was so good-natured on Tuesday and Wednesday. But Fulton was voted down. Pius Ninth is declared infallible, but Dr. Murdock, speaking the solid sense of the Baptist clergy, says: Let us leave the question of Dickens and his soul to the Almighty with full powers. Forty to one the council says amen to Dr. Murdock, and Fulton goes home to write another shrieking sermon for the Tremont Temple conventicle. You don't know Fulton if you suppose he is going to leave it to the Almighty. Not he. Tremont Temple is a co-ordinate branch of the divine government, in his opinion; and Dickens will not be saved with his consent. He hopes for better things than that. We shall watch for further developments with intense interest. Meanwhile, I hear that other councils are to be called, the Rev. Frederic Ingham having summoned the Sandemani n clergy to a conference at an early day. Dickens, of course, has to await the decision of all these bodies.

THE RABBI AND THE SKEPTIC.—A Persian came to Rab with the request—"Teach me the law." Rab consented and began teaching him the Hebrew alphabet. "Say aleph," said Rab. The Persian replied, "Who says that this letter is called aleph?" "Say beth," Rab continued, and the Persian skeptic repeated, "Who says that this letter is called beth?" Rab got angry and drove him out of the house. The Persian skeptic went to the colleague of the former, the learned Samuel, and made the same proposal. Samuel also began to teach him the Hebrew alphabet, and the Persian repeated his question, "Who tells me truly that this is an aleph and that is certainly a beth?" Samuel caught the skeptic by the ear and pinched him so well, that he cried out, "Oh, my ear! Oh, my ear!" "Who tells you that this is called an ear?" Samuel said. "Why, because every body calls it so," said the skeptic. "Well then," said Samuel, "every body calls these letters aleph and beth."—Midrash Koheleth.

Miss Phoebe Couzens, the St. Louis brunette, in a speech at the woman's rights meeting in New York, on Tuesday, mentioned her recent discovery of what the mission of the inferior being, man, is. It is to clean household crockery; and this she based on the authority of the Bible, in II Kings, xxi, 13; "I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish; wiping it, and turning it upside down." Miss Couzens thinks there is quite as much reason in this as in the text by which woman's sphere is established.—N. Y. Independent.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Please record my name for a file of THE INDEX, and I hope that I am in season with my application. I have frequently seen copies of your paper, but have not been able until lately to subscribe for it. As I can see it every week at the house of a friend here, I prefer to wait now until a new volume is commenced, securing, by the means you present, a bound file of Volume I.

There are two reasons which make me want THE INDEX. The first is the amount of information given in it by the practised minds who are interested in it, and the second is the honest fearlessness with which it meets every issue. You and I, sir, are very far apart in our views, and every number of your paper has contained some things which I would wish unsaid, and which I have regarded as being based upon false ideas; but I am a Liberal Christian, regarding the promotion of the soul's growth as being of more importance than the building up of any religious system, and am, therefore, glad to see honest opinion fearlessly expressed, though that opinion be diametrically opposed to what I regard as being truth. We are as far apart as a Conservative Unitarian Christian minister and a man who rejects the Christian name can be, but I think that our objects merge in the desire to make man happier and more noble. In such a work you are my fellow-worker, and I am,

"I know you must be working very hard with brain and pen, and pray your strength may hold out, so that you may somewhat complete the great labor you have undertaken. You see what Mr. Wasson says in the last Radical. I think (but wish to read his paper more fully) that he is under misapprehension. He may be still ridden somewhat by the theological idea. To my own thought, your definition of religion would have been more satisfactory, had it put religion as the recognition of, and the endeavor on the part of man to attain the infinite perfect. I think we shall have to admit religion in many instances where there is no recognition, certainly no conscious, witting recognition, of a personal Deity. Indeed I somewhat suspect that in the higher stages of attainment the soul rises beyond the sphere of person to rest in Substance, in Being alone, when it dwells with the supreme. There is constant need to withdraw ourselves from fastening too strongly upon, irresistible as is the necessity of seeking communion with, person; and to trust in the idea that the infinite perfect shall yet be found by us in person. In highest mood, however, perhaps we do in a degree transcend that, and repose in infinite truth, excellence and beauty alone. Certain it is, I think, that we make our nearest approaches to God in those ideals which illumine and command us."

"A friend induced me to subscribe for THE INDEX about two months since. I admire its independent and fearless position. It fills a vacuum that has been caused by the advancement of intellect and mind beyond the dogmas of a fossilized orthodox religion,—a religion that belonged to an age of the world, and a condition of society fast passing away, and the sooner the better for mankind. When I contemplate the number and the magnitude of the reforms needed to-day in our nation, in religion, in finance, and in every department of government, we are glad to see true and fearless advocates of the cause of truth, justice, and humanity. I wish you to put my name down for one bound copy of THE INDEX. I intend to try and send some subscribers soon."

A WOMAN'S QUESTION.

BY ADELAIDE ANNE PROCTOR.

Before I trust my fate with thee,
Or place my hand in thine,
Before I let thy future give Color and form to mine,
Before I peril all for thee, question thy soul to-night for me.

I break all slighter bonds, nor feel
A shadow of regret;
Is there one link within the past
That holds thy spirit yet?
Or is thy faith as clear and free as that which I can pledge to thee?

Does there within thy dimmest dreams
A possible future shine,
Wherein thy life could henceforth breathe
Untouched, unshared by mine?
If so, at any pain or cost, O tell me before all is lost.

Look deeper still. If thou canst feel
Within thy inmost soul,
That thou hast kept a portion back,
While I have staked the whole;
Let no false pity spare the blow, but in true mercy tell me so.

Is there within thy heart a need
That mine cannot fulfil?
One chord that any other hand
Could better wake or still?
Speak now—lest at some future day my whole life wither and decay.

Lives there within thy nature hid
The demon-spirit change,
Shedding a passing glory still
On all things new and strange?
It may not be thy fault alone—but shield my heart against thy own.

Couldst thou withdraw thy hand one day
And answer to my claim,
That fate, and that to-day's mistake—
Not thou—had been to blame?
Some soothe their conscience thus; but thou wilt surely warn and save me now.

Nay, answer not—I dare not hear,
The words would come too late;
Yet I would spare thee all remorse,
So comfort thee, my fate!
Whatever on my heart may fall—remember, I would risk it all!

LOGIC "ON THE RAMPAGE."

Prof. Tayler Lewis comes out with the following ponderous syllogism in the Independent, and thinks it conclusive against the exclusion of the Bible from the Schools:—

"MAJ. Political truths vitally connected with the national well-being ought to be taught in the national schools.

MIN. That a nation of people which will not serve the Lord shall perish, is a political truth vitally connected with the national well-being.

CONCLUSION. Therefore, the truth that a nation or people which will not serve the Lord shall perish, should be taught in our national schools."

But since he himself says that the second or minor premise is only "for all who believe the Scriptures to be the Word of God, containing absolute truth, and especially where they speak of things pertaining to the destinies of individuals or communities," his syllogism will convince only those who believe already that "serving the Lord" requires the American people to make their public school system, which is supported by taxing Jews, Catholics and liberals as well as Protestants, an engine for propagating Protestant orthodoxy and oppressing all who discard it. The "service of the Lord" which consists in open, wilful and defiant violation of justice and equal rights, is in our opinion the shortest possible road to national ruin. The people of the United States, although perhaps not able to chop logic successfully with Prof. Lewis, will yet see clearly enough that the above "minor premise" is a huge absurdity; for it has no bearing at all on the school question, unless it be admitted that "serving the Lord" means enforced reading of the Bible in the common schools,—that is, compulsion of non-Protestants to pay for Protestant worship. When the people get their eyes open, "the Lord" will enlist few volunteers among them for this sort of "service." We commend the following extract from the nineteenth chapter of Mrs. Stowe's "Oldtown Folks" to Prof. Lewis's attention, as foreshadowing the probable fate of his syllogism:—

"You know everybody's religious opinions are a matter of discussion in our neighborhood, and Ezekiel Scranton, a rich farmer who lives up on the hill, enjoys the celebrity of being an atheist, and rather values himself on the distinction. It takes a man of courage, you know, to live without a God; and Ezekiel gives himself out as a plucky dog, and able to hold the parson at bay. The parson, however, had privately prepared a string of questions which he was quite sure would drive Ezekiel into strait quarters. So he meets him the other day in the store.

'How's this, Mr. Scranton?' They tell me that you're an atheist.'

'Well, I guess I be, Parson,' says Ezekiel, comfortably.

'Well, Ezekiel, let's talk about this. You believe in your own existence, don't you?'

'No, I don't!'

'What! not believe in your own existence?'

'No, I don't.' Then, after a moment,—'Tell you what, Parson, ain't a-going to be twitched up by none o' your syllogisms.'

The Professor had better bury his syllogism in the same grave with the Parson's.

WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE.

Again Charles Sumner has made a stand in the U. S. Senate for justice and equal rights, and again he has been voted down,—so far as he can be "voted down." Has the last decade gone for nothing? Are the Chinese any less men than the negroes? Have we to fight the old battle over again? Henry Wilson, never to be relied on when principle and policy seem to conflict, has turned traitor to liberty for the votes of the Crispins. But unlike his predecessor, he has not had the shrewdness to secure cash in hand; and he may not have even the dreary satisfaction of casting his thirty pieces of silver on the ground, when he goes out to hang himself. If his recreancy should cost him his election, after all, true men will shed no tears. But Charles Sumner has again proved true as steel to the Declaration of Independence, which he, more than any other man, has toiled in Congress to redeem from the reproach of being a mere tissue of "glittering generalities." It is well for America that she has at least one incorruptible man in public life, whose faith in ideas is robust enough to withstand the pressure of all political temptations. We need not blush for our generation while Sumner lives.

The persecution of the colored cadet at West Point is abominable, and calls for the promptest and sternest repression by the government. This style of treatment by the other cadets is a disgrace to the institution, and, unless speedily changed, will defeat the appropriations annually solicited from Congress. The American people will not long let themselves be taxed for the support of this most cowardly bull-baiting.

ANTIOCH COLLEGE.

We had the pleasure recently of visiting Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, for the first time, and of delivering a lecture before the Adelpian Union, a Society composed of undergraduates. Nothing could be more cordial than our reception, and we brought away the pleasantest recollections of the beautiful and hospitable town. Antioch deserves the most generous support of liberal people. The management is at present more conservative than we could wish in some respects; but in the Faculty there are professors full of enthusiasm for all that is broad and broadening, fully abreast of the age, and inspired by its spirit, while among the students we met earnest and noble young fellows who are eager for the freest and freshest thought of the times, and who will hereafter do their share in the work of helping America to fulfil the grand professions she makes. Here both sexes are admitted equally to the privileges of the higher education; and both sexes, according to the testimony of the instructors, avail themselves of these privileges with equal fidelity and success. So far as we could judge, the prevailing spirit of the undergraduates is bolder and more progressive than that of the Faculty, notwithstanding the notable exceptions; and we believe that, were the College located further North, and frankly committed to a braver policy, its influence and its prosperity would be increased tenfold. Hundreds of young people would gladly flock to its halls, were they assured of a greater degree of freedom than is now allowed. We cannot but wish success to the efforts of the large-brained and large-hearted men in the college government, who are laboring to make Antioch in all respects worthy of its grand opportunities, and who put more faith in a generous culture than in the restraints of a timid sectarianism. It is not right that American colleges should ever be denominational; and although Antioch is under the control of the Unitarians, the least illiberal of all Christian sects, her future will be brighter when she is emancipated even from this feeble, irresolute denominationalism.

We cheerfully give place to the following notice, with our best wishes for the success of the National Standard:—

The National Anti-Slavery Standard, which has been published as a monthly magazine since April last, is to be resumed as a weekly journal. It will omit "Anti-Slavery" and be known as THE NATIONAL STANDARD. It will be devoted to Reform, Radical Politics and Literature. It will, as heretofore, be under the editorial management of Mr. A. M. POWELL, Wendell Phillips, Lydia Maria Child, Frederick Douglass, Julia Ward Howe, Hon. George W. Julian, Col. T. W. Higginson, Louisa M. Alcott, Rev. John T. Sargent, Mary Grew, and other able, well known writers are among its contributors. The first number of the new series of THE NATIONAL STANDARD will be issued Saturday, July 30, and will contain an article by WENDELL PHILLIPS on the Chinese Question.

The first Amendment to the Constitution of the United States begins thus:—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." In a recent pamphlet, entitled "A Secular View of Religion in the State," E. P. Hurlbut, ex-judge of the Supreme Court of New York, suggests the following alteration in this Amendment:—"Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law, etc., etc." This or a similar change should be adopted, and thus render impossible any retrograde action by the individual States in the direction of religious intolerance.

THE FORMATION OF RADICAL CLUBS.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir:—I most cordially agree with you in the leading sentiments of your article in THE INDEX under the caption, "A Move in the Right Direction." It is no new idea to me that the time is near when the friends of civil and religious freedom must unite for their common weal—must band together for mutual protection; the one cannot exist without the other, any more than body without soul or nature without God. Popery and Protestantism are alike in their demands, whatever may be the disguises of the former or the pretences of the latter; both demand unquestioning submission to authority, deny it as they may; and neither can exist much longer without it, and without such a coalition as their present status demands. Yours is truly no "idle prophecy." It has already often been threatened that the time will come, when "the Church" will be compelled to call upon the civil arm to protect it from what it inviolably calls "Infidelity," which, together with many other epithets, it only uses, like the fig leaves of old, to hide its own utter destitution of truth and righteousness from inevitable exposure.

However much "credulous Radicals" may think that Henry Ward Beecher is "liberalizing Orthodoxy," they will find that, when the time of trial arrives, he is joined to his idols, the wealth and established regime of our time. He is not the man to breast the impending storm, and many a strong and stronger man than he, will quail and fall before it. Not a man can endure the fiery ordeal "who loves the praise of men (the honored in Church, State and society) more than the praise of God." All who accept the popular view of truth and right should at first array themselves upon the "Orthodox" side of the questions to be mooted, as they surely will at last.

Let me suggest, in conclusion, that a proclamation embodying the ideas of your article should at once be printed and published, the necessary cost of which, I cannot doubt, all the lovers of freedom will join in defraying. These should be sown broadcast over the land now, although the great and final battle betwixt the coming truth and hoary-headed error and superstition will not be fought, until Popery or Protestantism shall bite the dust in their great struggle for supremacy and the spoils. Your friend in truth,

HAVANA, O., July 21, 1870.

UNIVERSAL AND POSITIVE TRUTH.

HOULTON, ME., July 6, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT,—I send you $1.00 for THE INDEX for the remainder of the year.

Allow me to say that I like your paper very much, and believe that it will help to do a much needed work.

It is doubtless true that every age is an age of transition, that no century leaves the world where it found it; but the change in public opinion is unprecedentedly rapid at the present time. Most thinking is directed toward the discovery of unity and universality. Nowhere is the tendency more active than in the religious world.

While the peculiar, the marvellous, the unnatural element of religion is fast losing its hold upon the thinking world, something is needed to aid mankind to recognize the universality of religion, as dissociated from all peculiarity of manifestation.

The different religions are by many considered as the creations of the individuals whose names they bear. Those who are unable to apprehend a truth of pure religion demand AUTHORITY for its acceptance. Their religious convictions are at second hand; but they will cease to demand authority for believing as soon as they are able to perceive and appreciate religious and moral truth for themselves.

I presume you have no lack of suggestions and advice; but my interest in positive religion must be my apology for expressing the hope that your paper will be as purely religious as possible.

I have but little faith in controversy as a means of enlightening the mind, increasing the knowledge, or ennobling the character of mankind. The one thing most needed is positive statement. If you make your paper truly and grandly religious, it will be a light in the darkness. I do not attach as much importance to the name Christian as you appear to,—at least I do not think it worth while to reject it or to insist upon its acceptance. I am far more desirous of acquainting myself with the laws of planetary motion than of discussing questions connected with their discovery.

It seems to me to be a waste of time to discuss the relation of absolute religion to any religious system. It is a fact that with many the word Christianity stands for all that is correct in opinion, and excellent in character. The only way to dispossess the world of this narrow notion is to show both by word and deed the eternal verity of the truths of religion; that they are more real than any system, that they do not ask leave to be of times or persons. In so far as THE INDEX helps to do this, in so far as it identifies itself with what is positive, will its influence be permanently felt.

If this is of any use to you, use it.

Truly yours,

EDWIN S. ELDER.

THE METHODIST VIEW OF WOMEN.

A few weeks since the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Cincinnati (at about the same time that the Baptist ministry were discussing in Boston whether Dickens was in hell) were considering the following resolution:

RESOLVED, That the licensing of women to preach the gospel is not in harmony with the Scriptures, or to be allowed as a prudential measure in the Methodist Episcopal Church providentially demanded by the times.

According to the report of the Chronicle, Dr. Wiley declared:—

"There is no Scripture in favor of women as preachers. There is not an example in the Bible of Christ putting woman in the position of a preacher of the gospel; but as helpers, as maids in the church, we find numerous examples. There is no record in the New Testament that indicates the least approximation to putting women into the ministerial office.

We are getting into another tendency. We have a big fight before us for the faith once delivered to the saints. Things are moving insidiously, though politely; they are undermining the great foundation of Christ's truth, in the depreciation of the minister's office and work, lowering it down till it means about nothing. The tendency is to take all that is divine out of the Christian ministry, as if the ministry was nothing specially different from any other calling; as if there was nothing in the lifting a man out of himself into the ministry of Christ.

There are some things I like in the woman movement. There is a coming back to the right of woman to work, and surely good will come out of it if we control the thing wisely. Women can do a vast amount for God; but her best way to work for God, for man, or for the church, is to continue to be a woman—a good, true woman. Let her talk like a woman, pray like a woman, and move in society as heretofore like a woman. Let her continue to make a good wife; or, if she don't find a good husband, let her make a good sister, and do whatever her sisterly heart prompts her to do. But everything that looks like woman coming to do anything, unless she can do it as a man, I deprecate.

The Chairman (Rev. Granville Moody)—She is as one born out of due time.

Rev. John Stuart—I endorse every word of Dr. Wiley's speech.

Rev. Mr. Maddy—I endorse it from A to Izzard.

Rev. Granville Moody said. It is but one of the efforts of rationalism and infidelity to raze the Christian ministry down, down to an undistinguishable level in the church of God. Whereas, if there is any veritable truth in Christianity more definite than another, it is this, that the coronation gifts of Jesus Christ, when he finished his work and ascended on high, were conferred on men. What were those gifts? The ministry, in the various orders—some apostles, some prophets, some pastors and teachers.

And this idea, the speaker argued, that everybody, including women, can be ministers and prophets of God, was a covert attack on the citadel of Christianity, and the mischievous work of infidelity.

Rev. W. Ferguson, of Wesley Chapel, said what alarmed him most, was that the women seemed to be going into this movement with a hop, step and a jump. They wanted to ascend the ladder without taking the intervening steps. Why not take the regular route, as man had done? He did not hear of any convictions of women being called of God to preach the gospel—not simply an impression, but a feeling of "wo is me if I do not preach." The great howl with women is about getting up into the high places. The idea of the degradation of woman is creeping into the minds of some of the best women in the church. They feel almost sorry that they were not made men. When God made them male and female, he didn't make any mistake. The mistake is in another direction. He thanked God for what he had heard this morning, and he only got up to endorse Dr. Wiley's speech. He felt as happy as if he were at a big camp-meeting, and hoped the brethren would show a little grit on this subject.

Mr. Ferguson closed with an expression of anxiety that women should remain women—that they should become great and glorious women. The men all want them to be women. He would to God the world had more women—at least more good and noble women. He could never forget that his mother was a woman, and that his sisters were women. It was his settled conviction that women weakened their own energies when they attempted to put themselves where God and nature didn't put them.

Dr. Rust, the late President of the Wesleyan Female College, said,—I believe the time has come when this body of ministers should give expression on this subject. We are floating on perdition on the tide of revolution."

It would be very funny, if it were not very sad, to see the blunt contempt for women felt by men of intelligence and refinement,—a contempt which they would probably themselves disclaim, but which shows itself naively in every frank discussion amongst them. To quote the words of M. Jules Ferry from a French journal:—

"There are two sorts of pride in the world, the pride of class and the pride of sex,—the latter far worse, far more subtle, far more hard and cruel than the former. This masculine pride, this sentiment of superiority exists in many minds, even in some who do not avow it; it creeps into the noblest natures, and may be found entwined in the secret folds of all hearts. Let us make the confession that, in the hearts of the best of us, there is something of the Sultan to be found."

No one who has ever observed the relations of the sexes, the attitude of men towards this question, their manner of discussing and disposing of it, even when their decision is on the affirmative of the question, will deny this. From men to women there is abundant kindness and courtesy, even chivalry and deference to beauty and weakness; but the feeling of equality is almost wanting. There are very few men in the world who do not look down on women.

This idea runs through all religions. "The Hindu Goddesses," says Sir William Jones, "are uniformly represented as the subordinate powers of their respective Lords." They have no individual existence. Among the Platonists the goddesses, as represented by Proclus, meant only the powers and faculties of the gods. In the Jewish account of the formation of woman, she is made out of one of Adam's ribs, and has had ever since the same relative importance, compared to man, that one bone bears to the whole two hundred and six. The idea of her inferiority is bound up with our very methods of life and the breath of her daily existence. To the profane and frivolous feminine mind it does not seem a "vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself" for a sensible, educated Christian woman to wish to perform the duties of the Methodist minister from "A to Izzard" (to use the classical language of one among them), to sit amongst these gentlemen, and discuss matters pertaining to their discipline. But it appears that, while women could be "maids" and "helpers," yet the "vertebral truth in Christianity is that the coronation gifts of Christ were conferred on men" in the ministry. It follows logically that to admit women would break this slender back-bone. "This idea that everybody, including women" (of course everybody would not include women, they being nobody, unless specially mentioned,) "can be ministers and prophets of God, was a covert attack on the citadel of Christianity." Not only that, but it would "tend to take all that is divine out of the Christian ministry" to bring these inferior creatures in. Crowned so by the "express image of the Father," and marked by his special favor, the logic of Christianity itself, nay, its very central truth, is the same inferiority and subjection of one sex to the other which finds expression in our statute books and Constitution. Our Christian churches to-day should echo with the old Jewish form of praise from the lips of men. "I thank thee, oh God! that thou hast not made me a woman."

The Rev. W. Ferguson evidently disagrees with Daniel Webster when he declares it to be unnecessary to re-affirm the laws of nature. He asserts in his pronouncement his settled conviction that "women weakened their own energies when they attempted to put themselves where God and Nature didn't put them. When God made them male and female, he didn't make any mistake. The mistake was in another direction." We have all heard of the man who did not believe in fanning mills, because they raised a breeze when God meant there should be a calm; and these men who are afraid that women will become men when God meant they should be women, always remind me of our friend of the fanning mill. We rest tranquilly, however, in the happy (if ignorant) conviction that neither women nor fanning mills will be able to reverse the decrees of God.

That every man "should magnify his office" is natural to humanity,—perhaps necessary; and in this work certainly the clergy have shown no little zeal. To exalt the ministry was in their minds, doubtless, to build up the ordinances of God, and one of those cases where "godliness is great gain," not only in the world to come, but in that which now is. Animated by these various feelings, they have always endeavored to make it appear that a peculiar sanctity surrounded them, enveloping them as it were in mystery. From the Eleusinian mysteries, where the high priest or hierophant, calling himself the revealer of sacred things, bound all by solemn oaths to secrecy, which oaths, if violated, exposed the offender to an ignominious death, down to the Scotch minister of the last century, who, as Buckle tells us, believed men were struck dead for speaking ill of ministers and showing contempt for their sacred calling, they have always been set apart from all other men. No wonder these gentlemen protest against the "depreciation of the minister's work, as if the ministry was nothing specially different from any other work,"—i. e. had no special sanctity.

We are told that Hipparchus, the Pythagorean, being charged with explaining clearly in his writings the doctrines of Pythagoras, was expelled from the school, and a monumental pillar erected to him as if he had been dead. The man in the churches who explains rationally the Christian faith and doctrines must look for the same fate, for the ministry need the mystery, the fables and the rites. As Strauss has said:—

"To every class or caste its own stability is the first consideration. Clearly, as soon as Christianity ceases to be thought miraculous, the clergy must cease to seem the miraculously gifted persons they have hitherto represented themselves. Their business will rather be to teach than to confer benedictions, and every one knows that the former office is as difficult and thankless as the latter is remunerative and easy."

The Jeremiads of these Methodist clergymen have good foundation in fact. It is the "effort of rationalism to raze the ministry down to the level of the people." In the free and rational religion of the future, the minister will have no mysterious sacredness, no adventitious aids. We are last getting over our reverence for names, and learning to honor only what is honorable in itself. So far as a minister does true work, his work shall praise him. Brought down from unnatural heights to the common working ground of the world, applying the moral test to its shifting exigencies, reconciling religion with the revelations of nature and the logic of science, we shall honor him for what he is and does, and not for his office or official trappings. Though the minister may suffer thereby, the man can only gain, as we grow to the faith that the only essential dignity is wrapped in humanity itself.

LILLIE PECKHAM.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

One of the most important questions that ever agitated the minds of men, is now coming before the world, viz: whether the character and religion of Jesus Christ shall be rescued from their continuous sacrifice by the teachings and creeds of the religious world? Jesus, truly good; is indeed the light of the world; but he is covered up and selfishly dealt with by superstition and the tradition of by-gone ages, until he is lost as a pearl buried in the mud. He is made the traffic of a priesthood. Whilst he was a practical philanthropist of the highest and most finished order, he is made to be a myth as meaningless in character as any of the gods of heathen mythology. The religion that is taught in his name is without truth or morality; whilst the religion that he taught was in fact the power and fruition of love. Connected with him, as being both himself and the Father, is represented a God of all wrath and vengeance; intent upon eternally torturing, but never giving any relief, even by annihilation, to his own offspring, unless they undergo certain manipulations of certain persons claiming exclusive power over the destiny of their fellowmen, and giving formal assent to certain creeds at which the unperverted soul is in eternal revolt.

But it is said that by this I am opposing the churches. It is not so. What I would do would be to build two churches where now stands one, if they would commit to the flames every man-written creed in Christendom, and seek to make some amends for the crimes committed in the name of religion by a bold, faithful advocacy of the truths of God against the shocking errors of men. Earth has drunk more blood, professedly shed in the name and cause of Jesus, and more flesh has been tortured by those claiming to be the lovers and followers of the Carpenter's Son, than in any one other cause that ever moved men to the wickedness of death and slaughter. Insanity has been made to fill asylums, and millions have wished they had never been born, by reason of the horrors of a religion taught as that of one of the most lovely, self-sacrificing men the world ever saw, the immortal Jesus. Is it not time that truth should "have free course and be glorified?"

Shall men or organizations of men be feared more than God, or their terrible errors be deferred to?

Let war be waged against all errors in high as well as low places; and with Solomon, let it be said "there is no discharge in this war."

Every soul is miserable whilst error rules over it; and every one is happy which is blessed in the reign of truth, for this is as the law of heaven. The only salvation needed of man is from error, for God is truth, and to dwell in truth is to be Godlike and by decisive destiny to be happy. Then let the cause of truth be urged with constancy and power, that Jesus and his religion may be redeemed of the wrong continuously committed upon them by those who pretend to be teachers sent of God for their defence and advocacy. Let all who dare, then "come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

THOMAS BARLOW.

CANASTOTA, N. Y., July 11, 1870.

WHAT IS THE MATTER?

[From the Morning Star, Dover, N. H.]

There is trouble among laborers. They are uneasy, dissatisfied, rebellious. They feel that capital has an undue advantage; that it oppresses them; takes the cream of their toil and leaves the poorer part to the toiler; that the rich are growing richer and the poor poorer, and that capital is responsible for it all. Various contrivances are tried for a remedy. "Trades unions," strikes, co-operative societies, are fully employed. They may have done some good; they have undoubtedly done much evil. Capital has suffered some, but labor much more. That is the sad feature of it.

The loss of time by strikes, for five years past, amounts to millions, which temporary increase of wages has not replaced. That is a tax upon the poor. Moreover, strikes have made capital timid, turned it aside from productive industry, into loans and stocks and speculations. This has limited employment, increased competition for situations and depressed wages, and thus brought another tax upon the poor. The risks and perplexities to capital in business have also decreased manufacturing and the products of industry below the demands of the market, so that prices have been high and the cost of living increased. Herein, again, the poor have suffered. On account of this uneasiness, laborers perform less than formerly, from ten to twenty per cent.; this increases the cost of production, the price of goods and the expense of living, and the poor are made to suffer.

These "unions," "strikes," and disturbing movements are not remedial of the difficulty. They are mere stimulants to the suffering body. Yet the agitation may lead to sure relief. Capital and labor are not natural enemies, they are friends. It is selfishness and ignorance which has set them at variance. The capitalist is greedy of so much that he often gets nothing; and the laborer is so anxious to secure the highest possible salary for the least possible work, that he does not prosper. A little wisdom and more benevolence will cure the difficulty.

Some in this country, more in England, have given laborers a personal share in the prosperity of business, and have been generously rewarded. Several firms which were losing money, have made a large gain by this arrangement. One case will illustrate the whole. A large firm in England was losing money constantly, and became satisfied that the fault was in the carelessness and indolence of the laborers. As a remedy, they issued stock, in small shares, giving an interest in the profits but no voice in the direction; and offered to all the men, pro rata, one-half of the profits above ten per cent. By degrees they became interested, as they saw that the measure was proposed in good faith; and the result was, that losses were changed to fifteen per cent. profits. The men did twenty per cent. more work, and did it better than before.

"There is a great deal of human nature in man," is a quaint saying; but the fact seems to be often forgotten. Nothing will inspire a man to effort like the prospect of bettering his condition. He is "saved by hope." It is fearfully disheartening to a man to feel that he must always plod, day in and day out, for a mere subsistence. Capitalists owe it to humanity to relieve the laborer from this burden. Self-interest and benevolence both demand a great change in this matter. It is a sin and a curse to allow men to wear this heavy yoke. Rich men can open the door of hope if they will; they can make the poor feel that capital is their friend, and that men who control it desire their elevation.

In this way an increase of laboring force would be secured of from ten to twenty per cent., and the increased attention to business would greatly improve the quality of the work. Then capitalists would freely invest their money in productive industries, business would be active, employment brisk, wages good, living cheap, profits sure; and we should escape this immense tax upon industry, of twenty per cent. less labor done, and so badly done, which now falls mostly upon the poor.

"THE GOD OF OUR FATHERS."

Mr. Max Mueller, in his third lecture on the "Science of Religion," (printed recently in Fraser), referring to a former lecture at the Royal Institution, observed:—"I wish to call back to your recollection the fact that, exploring together the ancient archives of language, we found that the highest God had received the same name in the ancient mythology of India, Greece, Italy and Germany, and had retained that name whether worshipped on the Himalayan mountains, or among the oaks of Dodona, on the Capitol, or in the forests of Germany. I pointed out that his name was Dyau in Sanskrit, Zeus in Greek, Jovis in Latin, Tiu in German; but I hardly dwelt with sufficient strength on the startling nature of this discovery. These names are not mere names; they are historical facts, aye, facts more immediate, more trustworthy, than many facts of mediæval history. These words are not mere words, but they bring before us, with all the vividness of an event which we witnessed ourselves but yesterday, the ancestors of the whole Aryan race, thousands of years it may be before Homer and the Veda, worshipping an unseen Being, under the self-same name, the best, the most exalted name they could find in their vocabulary—under the name of Light and Sky. And let us not turn away, and say that this was after all but nature-worship and idolatry. No, it was not meant for that, though it may have been degraded into that in later times; Dyau did not mean blue sky, nor was it simply the sky personified; it was meant for something else. We have in the Veda, the invocation Dyau pitar, the Greek, Zeus pater, the Latin, Jupiter; and that means in all three languages what it meant before the three languages were torn asunder—it means Heaven-Father! These two words are not mere words; they are to my mind the oldest poem, the oldest prayer of mankind,—or at least of that pure branch to which we belong,—and I am as firmly convinced that this prayer was uttered, that this name was given to the unknown God before Sanskrit was Sanskrit and Greek was Greek, as when I see the Lord's Prayer in the languages of Polynesia and Melanesia, I feel that it was first uttered in the language of Jerusalem. We little thought when we heard for the first time the name of Jupiter, degraded it may be by Homer or Ovid into a scolding husband or a faithless lover, what sacred records lay enshrined in this unholy name. We shall have to learn the same lesson again and again in the Science of Religion—viz. that the place whereon we stand is holy ground. Thousands of years have passed since the Aryan nations separated to travel to the North and the South, the East and the West; they have each formed their languages, they have each founded empires and philosophies, they have each built temples and razed them to the ground; they have all grown older, and it may be wiser and better; but when they search for a name for what is most exalted and yet most dear to every one of us, when they wish to express both awe and love, the infinite and the finite, they can but do what their old fathers did when gazing up to the eternal sky, and feeling the presence of a Being as far as far, as near as near can be; they can but combine the self-same words, and utter once more the primeval Aryan prayer, Heaven Father, in that form which will endure forever "Our Father which art in heaven."

MONARCHICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

The Russian dynasty is the most costly of any in Europe, while France and Turkey are but a little way behind. In Russia royalty costs $8,500,000 a year; in France, $7,000,000; in Turkey, $6,600,000. Other European nations allow their sovereigns smaller amounts. Austria heads their list. The house of Hapsburg receives in the aggregate $4,000,000 a year.

Italy comes next, with $3,200,000; then Prussia, with $2,400,000; while England provides about $2,375,000 for her royal family. Among the smaller monarchies, Bavaria is the most costly, and sets apart for her king and family $1,350,000. Portugal pays $666,000; Holland, $500,000; Sweden and Norway, $260,000; Denmark, $140,000; Wurtemberg, $220,000; Rome, $200,000. In the aggregate the crowned heads of Europe cost the people about $40,000,000 a year for private and household expenditure.

Referring to the remark of the woman's paper in New York, the Revolution, that "if the accounts men give of the heavenly state be true, we shall have some wrongs to right in the next sphere," the New York Tribune very ungallantly says: "If that isn't adding new terrors to death, we should like to know what would be?"

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Report of the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready. This pamphlet contains a record of the proceedings of the Business meeting, including the Report of the Executive Committee for the year, the Addresses in full that were given at the morning and evening sessions of the Convention in Tremont Temple, and an abstract of the afternoon discussion on the question of Religion in the public schools. The Addresses are by O. B. Frothingham, on the Aims and Principles of the Free Religious Association; D. A. Wasson, on the Philosophical Basis of Religion; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, on Religion as a Social Force; Francis E. Abbot, on Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age; Samuel Johnson, on the Natural Sympathy of Religion; Isaac M. Wise, on the Universal Elements of Judaism; Thos. W. Higginson, on Mohammedanism; Wm. Henry Channing, on the Religions of China; W. J. Potter, on the Religious Condition of India.

The price of the pamphlet is fifty cents a single copy; in packages of five or more, thirty cents each. It can be obtained by addressing the Secretary of the Association, W. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.; also in Boston at Crosby & Damrell's, 100 Washington St., and at the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield St.; in Cincinnati, of Bloch & Co., 150 West Fourth St., and in Toledo at the office of THE INDEX.

The Address of Mr. Channing on the Religions of China, which was shortened in delivery for want of time, is printed in the pamphlet entire as he prepared it. This is a specially timely and valuable contribution to the discussion of the Chinese question in this country. A small edition of it has been printed in a separate pamphlet, which can be obtained as above for thirty cents a copy.

FREE RELIGION DOES NOT PROSPER.

The religious newspapers of all denominational stripes are making much of the fact that Samuel Johnson, Minister of the Free Church in Lynn, Mass., recently resigned after a service of seventeen years, and that the Society, in consequence, has voted to disband. The Christian Register says, "We have another instance of the difficulty, bordering on impossibility, of establishing a permanent church on any other basis than the most dis-ting and positive loyalty to Christ." And this fact, coming so soon after the dissolution of Mr. Connor's Society in Boston and the suspension of The Radical, gives the sects a good opportunity to illustrate the lesson that radicalism in religion is not "prosperous";—a lesson, however, which radicals have well learned; yet still they somehow insist on believing that there is another kind of "prosperity" than that which is measured by financial success. As to The Radical, we have very good authority for stating that the magazine is not dead, but is only taking a rest preparatory to a fresh and stronger start. On the question of the power of the Radical ideas in religion to sustain churches, we have something to say; but shall defer saying it till after vacation-time, because we want it read. Meantime let the following extract from the Boston Commonwealth stand against the paragraphs in the religious papers which assert the poverty and failure of free religion:—

"FREE RELIGION."—In the Gospel Banner of July 16th, a Universalist paper, published in Augusta, Me., appears the following paragraph, showing shallow criticism by a Universalist editor:—

No Root in Itself.—Free religion does not prosper. It starved out Higginson, drove Wasson to the Custom House, compelled Parker to live on his own fortune. The Radical, its organ, is defunct. It has no root in itself nor elsewhere.—Covenant.

Doesn't this species of reasoning (?) prove a little too much? For instance, suppose we extend the illustration by a few historic parallels:—

Christ's religion does not prosper. He was put to death for teaching it. One of his disciples, Stephen, was stoned to death; another was crucified head downwards; another is said to have been boiled to death in a cauldron of oil; others had their heads cut off, etc., etc.

Or further, free government, called republicanism, does not prosper. It died out in Rome, long ago—went "up" among the Dutch—has been knocked to pieces half a dozen times in France, which has now the most despotic government on the globe, maintained by craft and espionage, and every now and then galvanized by a war provoked for that purpose. In this country, where it lives (as the paragraph quoted says Theodore Parker did) "on its own fortune," it is not yet a century old. Monarchies only seem to "prosper" in the long run.

Still further, we have known of Universalist periodicals and Universalist societies that long ago perished, and their Orthodox neighbors averred that they didn't "prosper" because they "had no root" in a correct interpretation of the Bible, nor in the wants of the human soul. Please observe that we don't say this. We only cite, for the edification of the Universalist Banner, the conclusions of some of its theological adversaries to show it how it can be hoisted by its own petard.

Surely the conductors of that paper are not shallow enough to suppose that the ideas inculcated, and the broad, catholic spirit and the genial humanities diffused, by Parker, Higginson, Wasson, and others who toiled in those blessed fields, have perished because they don't keep up an unbroken series of meetings!

The Progressive Friends, at their yearly meeting at Longwood, adopted this "Testimony" on "Religion and the Common Schools":—

Having observed with great interest the discussion that has sprung up of late in various parts of the country upon the subject of religious instruction in the common schools, we are constrained to affirm the following propositions:—

1. That the governments of this country, State and National, deriving as they do their just powers from the consent of the governed, and drawing their support as they do from people of every variety of theological opinion, have no right to become teachers of theology, or even to inquire which among the various theological systems of the world is true and which of them are false.

2. That the declaration so often made, that this is a Protestant country and that its institutions rest upon the Bible as an authoritative revelation of the Divine Will and a perfect rule of human duty, is both historically and constitutionally false; that the question whether the Bible is or is not such a book is a question upon which the governments, State and National, of this country have no right to pronounce judgment; and that, concerning religion, their duty is to protect the people in "the free exercise thereof."

3. That the schools established by the State and supported by general taxation should be confined to scientific and secular teaching, and to the inculcation of those principles of good morals which belong to no sect or party, and which, being the common inheritance of mankind, are essential to the safety of republican government.

A convention of the Jewish Rabbis from various parts of the United States, recently held in Cleveland, adopted the following statement of principles:—

"Whereas, In consideration of the religious commotion now agitating the public mind in both hemispheres, in accordance with the principles of Judaism, it is unanimously declared:

"1. Because with unshaken faith and firmness we believe in one indivisible and eternal God; we also believe in the common Fatherhood of God and the common brotherhood of men.

"2. We glory in the sublime doctrine of our religion, which teaches that the righteous of all nations, without distinction of creed, will enjoy eternal life and everlasting happiness.

"3. The divine command, the most sublime passage of the Bible, 'Thou shall love thy fellow-man as thyself,' extends to the entire human family, without distinction of either race or creed.

"4. Civil and religious liberty, and hence the separation of church and state, are the inalienable rights of man, and we consider them to be the brightest gems in the Constitution of the United States.

"5. We love and revere this country as our home and fatherland for us and our children, and therefore consider it our paramount duty to sustain and support the government, to favor by all means the system of free education, leaving religious instruction to the care of the different denominations.

"6. We expect the universal elevation and fraternization of the human family to be achieved by the natural means of science, morality, freedom, justice and truth."

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

ANOTHER SCENE IN THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

According to reports received at Vienna, a speech made at a recent sitting of the Council by Cardinal Prince Schwarzenburg created even a greater uproar than the famous one of Bishop Strossmayer. He said that the time for religious wars was past, and that an epoch of conciliation was at hand. It was equally unchristian, unintelligible, and incorrect to place the Protestants in the same category with heathens and atheists. The Roman Church and the Roman bishops must accept a word of advice on this subject from the German and Austrian prelates. The latter are in daily communication with Protestants, and know them better than those who never see them or read their books.

The presiding legate, Cardinal de Angellis, here interrupted the speaker, and a warm dispute between the two cardinals ensued. The President strove repeatedly, but in vain, to silence the Cardinal with his bell, and at length the bishops drowned his protests in a storm of hisses, in the midst of which the Cardinal was carried from the tribune, half-fainting from excitement, to his seat.

In Illinois, Ann Jordan, of the Protestant Methodist Church, gained quite a reputation as a local preacher. Ann was always ready, largely to the annoyance of Peter Cartwright. She was present at one of Cartwright's camp-meetings once, a good feeling prevailed, and many were at the altar. Cartwright called on her to kneel, and asked some one to lead in prayer. Ann struck off at once, with much feeling and power. Cartwright, not recognizing her voice, shouted out "Amen!" A brother, kneeling close by, whispered, "It is Ann Jordan praying." Cartwright, looking round and seeing that it was so, cried out, "I take that Amen back."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to-day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

A PLAIN TALK TO YOUNG MEN.

[Remarks at the Christmas Festival of the "Toledo Business College," 1869.]

GENTLEMEN OF THE BUSINESS COLLEGE:—At the courteous invitation of your instructors, I have consented to say a few words to you this evening by way of preface to your Christmas festivities. We Yankees are said to be a nation of speech-makers; and certainly no public occasion is regarded among us as quite complete,—as quite rounded off and properly embellished,—unless a speech is administered to us either in an allopathic or homœopathic dose. Let me relieve your natural apprehensions at the outset; I promise to-night to be a homœopathist. If my speech is not as sugary as a homœopathic pill, I trust it will, at least, prove to be as small.

Allow me, then, to say a few words about the business man as he ought to be. To-night, I know, is a festive occasion, and the oysters are growing impatient for your company; but if it is a wise maxim, as we are all told it is—"In time of peace prepare for war,"—then perhaps it would be a maxim equally wise,—"In time of play prepare for work." The best use of recreation is to give us heart and strength for the great battle of life; and your feast will be none the worse, if it is seasoned with a little earnest thought.

What is the main thing in the character of the business man as he ought to be? I should say, first, he must have a business, and secondly, he must mind it. His business must be a useful, honorable one; and he must attend to it. There are a great many kinds of business, and some of them are too mean for decent people. Every man who produces something,—something that the world needs,—is a public benefactor. So every man who does something that the world needs to have done, is a public benefactor. But any man whose business makes the world any worse than it was before, cannot be, in my opinion, a business man as he ought to be. The first thing, then, is to choose a business that shall make the world better, not worse. Perhaps you may not thus choose the business which will make you rich the quickest; but, nevertheless, I think you will have chosen as you ought to choose.

The next thing, plainly, is to carry on your business earnestly. Enterprise, energy, pluck, devotion to what needs to be done, and determination to do it as it ought to be done,—that is what every man wants, be his business what it may. Attention to business is the road to success. The true business man is never ashamed of honest work,—he is only ashamed of idleness and shiftlessness. Whether employer or employee, he will make it a matter of duty to do well whatever he undertakes to do at all. I wish that business men generally put more conscience into their work. There is a vast deal of work done in the world that is done so poorly as to be a disgrace to him who does it. If the true business man is a shoemaker, he puts conscience into every stitch; if he is a shop-keeper, he puts conscience into every sale of goods; if he is a merchant, he puts conscience into every transaction. Whatever else he may be, he is always a thoroughly honest man, scorning to do poor work or take unfair advantage of any one. That is a very poor success which brings the man a big deposit in the bank, but leaves him bankrupt in honesty and self-respect. I would rather fail entirely, than succeed in that way. Character is worth more, after all, than money, and is harder to get. Money will buy almost everything, but it won't buy character. That you must make,—each one of you for himself. And if, as I hope, you want to make character more than you want to make money, it is time to begin at once. Good principles are like corn,—you must plant them in season, if you want to get a crop.

So, then, the true business man must have a good, honorable, useful business,—he must faithfully and industriously attend to it,—and he must attend to it in an honest, high-minded manner. If he does this, he will surely succeed in the end, despite all misfortunes and obstacles; and I would not give a penny for any other sort of success.

But the business man as he ought to be will be something more than a mere business man. Young men with excellent purposes sometimes make a great mistake in thinking they ought to give up every moment of their time to business, and to neglect everything else. That is a sad error. Every young man entering life ought to give some portion of his time regularly,—I don't care if it is only half an hour a day,—to the development of his mind, to the gaining of useful information, to the cultivation of some innocent and ennobling taste. Why, a man who has no soul except for his business is a "poor stick,"—a mere machine. A taste for reading is worth more than a hundred thousand dollars to him who has it,—nay, worth more than any sum I could name. A rich man without that or some similar taste does not know how to enjoy his money. His only resource is to keep on making money, unless he prefers to spend it; and a mind that is not well developed does not know how to spend it wisely. A man worth his two millions used to tell me that he would gladly give it all, if he could only have himself the education which his lazy and stupid boy refused to acquire. If you will pardon the advice, I would say to each of you,—"Make it a rule, never to be broken, to devote at least half an hour a day to the reading of some useful book,—not stories chiefly, either. Stories are good in their place; but every man needs a knowledge of history, the elements of science, and other useful subjects; and if he has only half an hour to give to reading, he will be very foolish to give it all to novels. Be hungry and thirsty after knowledge, of all kinds; and be sure you will be none the worse, but all the better, as business men."

Furthermore, the business man as he ought to be will not be a selfish curmudgeon, caring only for his own gain or comfort or even improvement. He will be public-spirited. He will aim to help on every movement that promotes the public welfare. He will do cheerfully his share in all works of a public character, and identify his private interests with those of his city, his country, his race. He who grows rich in any community owes a large debt to it. He is a mean fellow, if he shrugs his shoulder when asked to help on some public project,—he is worse than mean, if he buttons up his pantaloons pocket when asked to contribute to some useful public charity. Don't narrow your minds down to selfish aims alone; but resolve so to succeed in business that the whole community shall rejoice in your success. Be ambitious to do some good in your day and generation. When you are dead, and a stranger asks about you—"What was he? what did he do?" resolve that a better answer shall be given than—"Well, I don't know, but he left a million dollars." A pretty poor record that, of a human life.

Lastly, about religion. The true business man, if he heartily believes in the church, will join it and do his duty as a church member. But if he does not believe in it, I will tell you one thing he will never do,—he will never join the church, or any society, for the sake of getting into business or making business friends, or for any other mean and dastardly motive. Depend upon it, he will never be a hypocrite. The religion he believes in is that of practical honesty, kindness to all men, fidelity to conscience even when it costs something. I don't care much what a man believes, provided he lives an upright and downright life,—a life that you and I may look at and say, "I wish I were as good a man as he." That is a religion worth having,—a religion that will wear well, with no shoddy about it,—a religion good enough to live by and to die by. And a religion like this the true business man will be sure to have,—depend upon that. I hope every one of you will have one like it.

But I am afraid that, despite my endeavors, I have wearied your patience after all. Let me make the best amends in my power by sitting down at once, and wishing you all, very sincerely, a "Merry Christmas" to night, and a great many others like it.

A STARTLING POSSIBILITY.

[The following article, published not long ago in the New York Times, and widely copied by the press, is a new instance of the fanatical perversion of science to the service of Scriptural prophecies. Foolish people sometimes suffer themselves to be panic-struck by just such visionary speculations as these. The best comment upon them will be found in the extract from Buckle which follows, and which shows that it is no new thing for scientific men to make fools of themselves and of the world through their undiscriminating faith in "Holy Writ."—ED.]

The sun is beginning to be an object of great anxiety to many scientific men. Spots on that orb are not at all uncommon, as may be ascertained by any one who will take the trouble to look at it through a bit of smoked glass. But these phenomena have of late assumed an appearance which astonishes astronomers, and it is calculated to alarm that class which fancies it can detect portents of the future in the heavens. There are great gulfs now to be seen in the sun, each larger than this earth which we think of so much consequence in the universe. They increase at a prodigious rate, and sometimes seem destined to work a convulsion similar to that which has undoubtedly overtaken other solar systems. Suns as vast as that which lights and warms this world have been shattered to pieces, or disappeared, and only the philosopher in his roving glance over the sky has detected the change. The inhabitants of the other planets would not notice the disappearance of the planet we inhabit, any more than we can see a speck of sand carried off by the wind on the sea-shore.

It is not mere theory, but an ascertained fact, that the sun is always in a highly fluid condition,—as one recent writer describes it, "a hurricane of flame, the disturbances of which might, perhaps, be best represented to our imaginations by the occasional explosion of a planet or two of nitroglycerine." It is, moreover, subject to "magnetic storms," produced, as many suppose, by the movements of planets around it. The great disturbance which is now going on was predicted months ago by scientific men. That we are much more concerned in the event than many people suppose, is quite certain. Self-registering magnetic instruments have revealed the fact that whenever a spot breaks out on the sun, the earth thrills under a mysterious magnetic influence. In one case, a few years ago, it is upon record that telegraphic machinery was set on fire and the "pen of Bain's telegraph was followed by a flame," at that very instant a sudden burst of light showed itself in the sun. "In the telegraph-station at Washington and Philadelphia, the signal-men received strong electric shocks." In fact, the electric condition of the earth is changed, though by what precise agency none can fully explain. We are at once lost in the region of conjecture, and can only feel that the fate which was foretold of old for the earth may at any moment overtake it. The forces are all in existence by which, in the solemn language of Holy Writ, "the Heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall all be burned up."

Once in every eleven years the sun exhibits the stupendous phenomena which are at present engaging the attention of philosophers. In 1859, "chasms and abysses," similar to those now reported, were seen by many observers. Their recurrence was predicted for 1870. Great disturbances usually accompanied these outbreaks, though why it should so happen is another of the unfathomable mysteries of the universe. In 1848, there were magnetic storms, and we had the French revolution. Again in 1859 they occurred, and we saw wars and rumors of wars in Europe. The electric condition of the atmosphere is thought to exert a greater influence upon the minds of men and nations than many are willing to believe, or than any one is able to explain. The telegraphs denote the changed condition of the earth, but they cannot indicate the extent of the change. In the language of the astronomer, whose description of the sun we have just quoted, "the pens of all our telegraphic wires may some day trace in flame a handwriting more ominous of human destiny than was the handwriting which, during Belshazzar's feast, traced a warning on the wall of the fall of the Babylonian dynasty."

SCIENTIFIC DELUSIONS.

[From "Buckle's History of Civilization in England," vol. 1, pp. 289-290.]

At the end of the fifteenth, and early in the sixteenth century, Stoeffler, the celebrated astronomer, was professor of mathematics at Tuebingen. This eminent man rendered great services to astronomy, and was one of the first who pointed out the way of remedying the errors in the Julian calendar, according to which time was then computed. But neither his abilities nor his knowledge could protect him against the spirit of his age. In 1524, he published the result of some abstruse calculations, in which he had been long engaged, and by which he had ascertained the remarkable fact, that in that same year the world would again be destroyed by a deluge. This announcement, made by a man of such eminence, and made, too, with the utmost confidence, caused a lively and universal alarm. News of the approaching event were rapidly circulated, and Europe was filled with consternation. To avoid the first shock, those who had houses by the sea, or on rivers, abandoned them; while others, perceiving that such measures could only be temporary, adopted more active precautions. It was suggested that, as a preliminary step, the Emperor Charles V. should appoint inspectors to survey the country, and mark those places which, being least exposed to the coming flood, would be most likely to afford a shelter. That this should be done, was the wish of the imperial general who was then stationed at Florence, and by whose desire a work was written recommending it. But the minds of men were too distracted for so deliberate a plan; and besides, as the height of the flood was uncertain, it was impossible to say whether it would not reach the top of the most elevated mountains. In the midst of these and similar schemes, the fatal day drew near, and nothing had yet been contrived on a scale large enough to meet the evil. To enumerate the different proposals which were made and rejected, would fill a long chapter. One proposal is, however, worth noticing, because it was carried into effect with great zeal, and is, moreover, very characteristic of the age. An ecclesiastic of the name of Auriol, who was then professor of canon law at the University of Toulouse, revolved in his own mind various expedients by which this universal disaster might be mitigated. At length it occurred to him that it was practicable to imitate the course which, on a similar emergency, Noah had adopted with eminent success.

Scarcely was the idea conceived, when it was put into execution. The inhabitants of Toulouse lent their aid; and an ark was built, in the hope that some part, at least, of the human species might be preserved to continue their race and repopulate the earth, after the waters should have subsided and the land again became dry.

About seventy years after this alarm had passed away, there happened another circumstance, which for a time afforded occupation to the most celebrated men in one of the principal countries of Europe. At the end of the sixteenth century, terrible excitement was caused by a report that a golden tooth had appeared in the jaw of a child born in Silesia. The rumor, on being investigated, turned out to be too true. It became impossible to conceal it from the public; and the miracle was soon known all over Germany, where, being looked on as a mysterious omen, universal anxiety was felt as to what this new thing might mean. Its real import was first unfolded by Dr. Horst. In 1595, this eminent physician published the result of his researches, by which it appears that at the birth of the child, the sun was in conjunction with Saturn, at the sign Aries. The event, therefore, though supernatural, was by no means alarming. The golden tooth was the precursor of a golden age, in which the Emperor would drive the Turks from Christendom, and lay the foundations of an empire that would last for thousands of years. And this, says Horst, is clearly alluded to by Daniel, in his well known second chapter, where the prophet speaks of a statue with a golden head.

THE DEADLY SIN OF DOING.

[If any one doubts that evangelical hymns are the vehicle of dogmas and ought for this reason to be prohibited in the common schools, let them read the following, published by the Dublin Tract Repository with the title—"Leaflets for Letters (Gospel, No. 38.)" This and similar documents are distributed on Boston Common and elsewhere, on Sunday, by agents of the Young Men's Christian Association.—Ed.]

DEADLY DOING.

"How much more will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from DEAD WORKS to serve the living God."—(Heb. ix: 14.)

"By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified."—(Gal. ii: 16.)

What, then, must I DO to be saved?

Nothing, either great or small,
Nothing, sinner, no;
Jesus did it—did it all,
Long, long ago.

When he from his lofty throne
Stoop'd to do and die,
Everything was fully done.
Hearken to his cry—

"It is FINISH'D!" Yes, indeed,
Finish'd every jot.
Sinner, this is all you need;
Tell me, is it not?

Weary, working, burden'd one,
Why toil you so?
Cease your doing; all was done
Long, long ago.

Till to JESUS' work you cling
By a simple faith,
'Doing' is a deadly thing—
'Doing' ends in death.

Cast your deadly 'doing' down—
Down at Jesus's feet;
Stand "IN HIM"—in him alone,
Gloriously "COMPLETE!" *

* "Ye are complete in him."—(Col. ii: 10.)

RELIGION IN THE COMMON SCHOOL.

[From the Present Age, Kalamazoo, Mich.]

"At the meeting of the Radical Club, Sunday evening, July 3, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

'Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed by the RADICAL CLUB to draw up a petition addressed to the Board of Education, requesting that the reading of the Bible, the singing of hymns, and public prayer, be henceforth discontinued in the public schools of this city; and that the Committee be instructed to report at the next meeting of the Club.'

The following persons were appointed by the Club to act as the above-mentioned committee: Mr. F. E. Abbot, Dr. T. M. Cook, Miss L. Peckham."

We clip the above from THE INDEX of Toledo, which indicates that this question will continue to be agitated, at least in our cities, and will no doubt extend to the country. So much has been said and written, and the public mind so thoroughly awakened upon the subject, that we say, let the question be met now. Let the friends of religious freedom maintain it inviolate as incorporated by the fathers in our Constitution, and oppose any system of religious teaching in our schools other than the great moral teachings held and taught in common by all peoples. It is well known that the time allotted to the reading of the Bible, singing, and prayer occupy much time, which, if harmlessly passed, we should not so seriously object to; but all liberals know that the hymns and prayers used on these occasions are steeped in orthodox sectarianism. We therefore advise our friends to bring this question before their School Board, and insist that the schools be devoted, as intended, to secular instruction only. If the Board refuse, and insist upon having their Christianity taught in the schools, let our liberal friends remember them at the succeeding election. Our free schools can only be maintained by keeping them non-sectarian. We do not mean Christian sectarianism, but that Christianity shall no more be taught than Judaism, or any other ism.

In the Toledo INDEX Abraham Lincoln's religion is advertised as given by his old law-partner, Wm. H. Herndon, of Illinois. Now, that round-about way to get at Mr. Lincoln's religious views may do for THE INDEX, but Spiritualists have a more direct method of communication—a spiritual telegraph. While others may be content to hear his views from his law-partner out in Illinois, Spiritualists hold communication with the Martyr-Saint direct.—Amer. Spiritualist.

A little boy was relating a story he had heard one day. His ideas becoming confused in some way, he could find no words to explain his meaning. At last he said: "Well, I know enough big words; but I don't know where to put them in."

AN ATTEMPTED EXPLANATION.

[From the Toledo Commercial of Aug. 1.]

Our City cotemporary, the INDEX, has invested heavily in a non-paying "point" on the Commercial. It states that we "declined to publish the advertisement of the 'Mass meeting of the Liberals,' notwithstanding the temptations of filthy lucre;" but that "at the next temptation, the poor Commercial succumbed. The advertisement of the Radical Club Meeting, the week after, was irresistible; it came—it saw—it conquered!" The only legitimate inference from this statement is, that the Commercial was "tempted" by money to publish one week an "advertisement" which, owing to its character, was refused the week before. In other words, the "Radical Club's" money was too much for the Commercial's "virtue." A few words will show how that is. On the evening of July 15th, the editor of the INDEX, Mr. F. E. ABBOT, left at the Commercial counting-room an advertisement of exercises to take place the following Sunday, with written directions for it to be arranged, displayed, and punctuated exactly as prepared, and to go only in the editorial columns of the next paper. An examination of the notice, after Mr. ABBOT left, suggested a doubt as to the propriety of inserting such advertisement in that way, and for that reason it was omitted. A week later Mr. ABBOT called with a second announcement, with the request that it be inserted in the advertising columns, for which it was readily accepted and published, just as the former would have been. At this time Mr. A. inquired why the first advertisement was not published, and was given the reason as above stated. The INDEX says the "Blade printed the same advertisement, 'asking no questions for conscience' sake.'" This statement is deceptive. The Blade published it—not as directed in the case of the Commercial, but in its advertising columns, just as the next notice appeared in the Commercial. And this is the extent of Mr. ABBOT's damage to the Commercial's "virtue!" Are all his conquests in the field of morals as brilliant, as readily won, and in the same way? We were about to quote him the ninth commandment, but he eschews the decalogue.

THE LIBERAL MEETING—A CARD.

[From the Toledo Blade, August 2.]

TOLEDO, Aug. 1, 1870.

An editorial paragraph in the Commercial of this morning, in which my name is mentioned, contains so many misstatements, that I ask the privilege of correcting a few of them in your columns.

1. The Commercial states that the refused advertisement of the "Mass Meeting of Liberals" was left at its counting-room "with written directions for it to go only in the editorial columns of the next paper." The italics are the Commercial's own, and emphasize a grave misrepresentation. I left the same advertisement both with the Blade and Commercial, with written directions that it should go into the "local column," the words being underscored. By this expression, I of course meant the first, second, or third column of the fourth page of the Commercial, which is headed "Local and Miscellaneous," and into which the Commercial is accustomed to admit paid advertisements at twenty cents a line; whereas by "editorial columns" the public of course understands the first few columns of the second page. In the "local" column, the Commercial a few days after published the advertisement of a County Convention; and it is plain enough that the rejection of my advertisement was caused by an unwillingness to give publicity to the proposed meeting. If the editor of the Commercial disputes my statement about the written directions, I call upon him to produce my MS., and submit it to any man who can read the English language tolerably written. The substitution of "editorial" for "local" is designed to mislead the public.

2. I inquired the reason for the rejection of my advertisement at the counting-room of the Commercial the very same day on which it should have appeared, and not, as the Commercial states, a week later.

3. No such reason was given me at all as that alleged by the Commercial. I was told that Mr. Waggoner, Senior, was out of town when I offered the advertisement (about 10 A. M. Friday, July 15,) and that Mr. Waggoner, Junior, had taken the responsibility of refusing it an insertion. Why he did so, I could not learn from the extremely prudent and reticent clerk in the counting-room, who left me to draw my own inferences—which I did. At no time whatever was the reason given to me which the Commercial declares to have been given.

4. I did not, as the Commercial states, request my second advertisement to be inserted in the "advertising columns." I meant to give verbally the same directions I had given before in writing, but forgot to say anything on that point; and advantage was taken of my forgetfulness.

5. It is true that the Blade did not, as requested, put the first advertisement in its local column; but it made an editorial reference to it in that column, which answered my purpose equally well. The Commercial did nothing of the sort with the advertisement it printed.]

In short, the Commercial has got out of the frying-pan into the fire. Since it has such astonishing reverence for the "decalogue," I wish the latter contained what I regret to say it does not contain—a general injunction to speak the truth. I can account for the Commercial's extraordinary misstatements only by the fact of this very unfortunate omission.

F. E. ABBOT, ED. INDEX.

MR. ABBOT PUBLISHES A CARD.

[From the Toledo Commercial of Aug. 4.]

Mr. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, not satisfied with the progress made in his campaign against the Commercial's "virtue," resorts to the Blade to supplement the work of THE INDEX. Why he did not send his "card" to us, that it might come before the same readers that saw the article to which it is designed as a reply, he does not explain. Our practice is very liberal in such cases.

Mr. Abbot says his direction in the case of the first advertisement of his Sunday discussion, was to have it inserted in the "local," not the "editorial columns" of the Commercial. We have not the order before us, and cannot state which term he used; and it matters little which, for has Mr. A., and himself an editor, yet to learn that the "local" are "editorial columns" of a newspaper, as truly as others? As we understand it, "editorials," wherever printed, consist of statements and opinions expressed in the name of the paper, and the columns in which these appear, are "editorial columns."

But Mr. Abbot seems to think, that because we publish the call for a Republican Convention in our editorial columns, we must, to be consistent, put his programme for a Sunday discussion in the same place. He appears to have forgotten that the Commercial is a political paper, in which such prominence to the notices of its own party is almost universal. He gives similar prominence to the doings of his Radical Club; but would he, even for "filthy lucre," do the same by the Republican call in his INDEX?

Mr. Abbot denies having been informed at our counting-room that his first advertisement was excluded on account of the location to which he limited its insertion. We can only repeat, on the authority of the book-keeper, that he was so informed; and we need only add, that our authority is that of a gentleman whose character for veracity stands above question.

But much of this discussion is upon unimportant points. The real question is, Did Mr. Abbot ask the insertion of his first notice in a place where he had no right to expect it to appear? This is all there is in the matter, for if he made an unreasonable request, he had no right to expect it to be granted. That he did make such unwarranted request, every newspaper man will tell him, and also that the Commercial did right in refusing it. Why he should expect special advantages daily denied to others, we do not understand. His second notice was left without directions as to place, and it appeared among the advertisements, as the one did in the Blade the week before.

Thus have we again exposed Mr. Abbot's impudent boast, that he with one dollar of the "Radical Club's money" had been "irresistible" to the Commercial's "virtue," it being able to stand but one of his powerful assaults! Mr. Abbot may be an experienced campaigner, but it seems he has yet to learn that about the most untimely thing a hen can do, is to cackle before she lays her egg. In accordance with this lesson from nature, the great captains of history never stopped their armies to rejoice over the bribing of a single sentinel, but sought rather to cover their lines of march and their plans of warfare, until a substantial victory could be won. Mr. Abbot seems to have entered upon the job of driving the Bible and religion out of Christendom, and proposes to inaugurate the work by driving them from the Public Schools of Toledo. Now, in view of what is before him, we submit whether it be consistent with the work of such magnitude, for him to be demoralizing "poor" newspaper publishers with "filthy lucre?" Is that policy an illustration of the morals which he proposes to substitute for those of the Bible?

It may relieve Mr. Abbot's mind if we assure him, positively, that the rejection of his first notice was not, as he seems to infer, because we were afraid to have our readers learn what he was about. Not at all. If he felt no delicacy on that point, we assure him that we did not. If the Bible and religion, in the Toledo Schools and elsewhere, cannot be maintained with Mr. Abbot in the full enjoyment of all legal rights of speech, they must go under, so far as we are concerned. We believe in free discussion of all public questions; and we further believe that citizens have just as legal a right to meet, indoors or out, on Sunday as on other days, to discuss the claim of the Bible to human belief, as to enforce the sanctions of that book upon the duties of men. We ask no man to accept our faith further than it is approved by his own judgment. It was in accordance with this principle that we copied and commented on remarks of Mr. Abbot and others at the meeting of July 17th, and when that gentleman undertakes to represent us as being so bigoted and narrow-waisted as to seek to suppress the discussion of any question, from fears of its consequences, he does us gross injustice.

[It is with great reluctance that we devote so much space to a local controversy; but since it has arisen out of our own criticisms in THE INDEX, it would be less than fair not to allow the Commercial to speak for itself to the same audience. How much its defence amounts to, our readers will judge for themselves. After replying to the above, we shall indulge the Commercial in its favorite luxury of "the last word."

1. Notwithstanding the Commercial's evident anxiety to wipe out all distinction between its "local" and other "editorial" columns, it is its well-known practice to exclude from the latter, and to admit into the former, paid notices of public meetings of all sorts—RELIGIOUS MEETINGS INCLUDED. That this statement is true, is shown by its advertisement of the meeting of the First Unitarian Society in the "local" column of its issue of July 23, which we reprinted and commented on in THE INDEX, No. 31. Instead, therefore, of being denied an unusual and improper request, we were denied a privilege habitually granted to others under like circumstances. If the "Mass Meeting" had been called to uphold Bible-reading in the schools, the Commercial would have had no hesitancy about printing it in its "local" column.

2. The kind of "veracity" practised by the Commercial can be inferred by a comparison of its own statements. In its issue of Aug. 1, it says:—"An examination of the notice, after Mr. Abbot left, suggested a doubt as to the propriety of inserting such an advertisement in that way, and FOR THAT REASON IT WAS OMITTED. . . . Mr. Abbot . . . was given the reason as above stated." It was this reason that we denied having received. On the publication of this denial, the Commercial says in its issue of August 4:—"Mr. Abbot denies having been informed at our counting-room that his advertisement was excluded on account of the location to which he limited its insertion, etc." This is not what we denied. The book-keeper informed us that our advertisement was not inserted as directed because Mr. Waggoner was out of town; and when we asked what this had to do with the question, he did not even hint at the "doubt as to the propriety" of printing the notice. The Commercial wriggles with great agility, but its head is pinned down under the fork of its own stick. If the book-keeper desires to liberate it from its awkward predicament, he must affirm what we really denied,—which if he does, we assure him his "veracity" will no longer be "above question." Our contemporary must learn to be either a little less given to misrepresentation, or else—a great deal sharper.

3. The Commercial contradicts itself, when it admits that it rejected our advertisement because of its "doubt as to the propriety" of printing it as requested: Had the "Mass Meeting" been called to defend Bible-reading in the schools, would any such "doubt" have suggested itself? What "impropriety" was there in printing our notice where similar notices are habitually printed, except that supposed to lie in the object of the meeting? Putting this "doubt" by the side of the subsequent defence of "free discussion," the former contradicts the latter, and the latter will pass for what it is—mere buncombe. We judge the Commercial by its works, not its words. There was no "impropriety" in advertising the meeting, if there was none in holding it; and there was none in holding it, except in the imagination of those who, like the Commercial, at heart dread all free discussion of the Bible-in-schools question.

The Commercial wonders why we did not send our card to itself for publication. Whether it would have published the card or not, we do not know. But if it means anything by this implied offer, we request it to copy the present note entire. The result will show how "liberal" its "practice" is.—Ed.]

SENSIBLE AND JUST.

[From the Watchman and Reflector.]

Ministers have their annual vacations, and this is well, but how about their wives? We confess that we do not like to see our ministers, so many of them, leaving their wives "at home to look after the children" and "attend to the house," while they are off having a good time. There is too much of this done. Wives need the rest and change just as much as the husbands, and their cares and labors would be as much lightened, and their souls as much cheered by a journey, a rest, a change, as their husbands. Ministers are too apt to use the singular number instead of the plural; instead of saying "I shall take a vacation so and so," or "my vacation," why not say "we" and "our"? The minister's wife deserves a vacation as well as her husband, and we believe that if clergymen would think of this a little more, their consciences would rebuke them for sins of omission in the past, and prompt them to due care in the future. Let parishes and churches also give this matter a little attention.

The following note, lately sent by HENRY WARD BEECHER to the proprietor of the New York Ledger, is good:—

My Dear Mr. Bonner:—I have just received a curious letter from Michigan, and I give it to you verbatim:

OWASSO CITY, Mich., 1870.

APRIL FOOL.

I have heard of men who wrote letters and forgot to sign their names, but never before met with a case in which a man signed his name and forgot to write the letter.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"THE INDEX seems to meet largely with responses from those who have not the means of paying for it. It would seem that the spirit of Free Religion should suggest, that those who have money should contribute towards keeping you constantly in funds for the purpose of sending the paper to such as hunger for its enlightenment and have nothing to pay.

I hear but one opinion expressed as to enlarging THE INDEX, and that is in opposition to it. Yet it were to be wished that it might be supported without much advertising, especially such as that headed 'Beautiful Women,' which we feel to be a desecration of its pages."

—"The last of April I wrote to you (enclosing two dollars) saying, I would like another copy of THE INDEX sent to my address. As my one copy comes again this week alone, I fear my letter never reached you. I will wait a few days longer when, if I hear nothing, I will again remit, for I must have the paper, one copy proving wholly inadequate to the demand for it. Then again the numbers that survive the circuit they are compelled to make, come home to me so completely worn out, that I can not preserve them. However, I am glad it is so, for this fact convinces me that they furnish what is indeed 'bread to the perishing,' or they would not be so thoroughly devoured. I do most heartily rejoice in your success, and trust it will continue. If you please, make no change in THE INDEX—a perfect little gem as it is. Can perfection be improved?"

—"And now a few words in regard to THE INDEX. It contains many articles that are very acceptable and highly approved by all the friends of a free and pure religion, but there is a portion of the paper which will not meet with general approval by your readers, that is, the large space occupied by the political questions of the day. There is a new problem of government presented to the American people, which nothing but time can solve; and any amount of puffing by its friends and advocates will not change in the least its final solution; and in my opinion the principles of Free Religion do not require any aid of this kind. In your lecture on Jesus and Socrates, you say they resemble each other in this,—that they did not mingle politics with either of their systems; and I think it is to be regretted that in this you should not follow their example."

—"I have time to write only a few words. I must say I think more of your paper, THE INDEX, than any paper I ever read; and have done the best I could to call attention to it. And although many of us here buy it at the News Room, I think many see it there and become interested in it, who would not if we subscribed to you, or if it was not kept for sale in the News Room. I gave a few copies to my brother in— a few days ago, and he requests me to have it sent to him for six months."

—"Please count me a subscriber for one of the bound copies of Vol. I of THE INDEX. I send away most of the current numbers, after reading, and want the whole together. I think I'll not trouble you with any advice or caution as to the manner of conducting THE INDEX, as you seem to be able to act so as to please yourself—which is success."

Poetry.

THE LITTLE WHITE CROSS:
IN MEMORIAM.

From her brow, so pale and smooth,
Brush the silken hair;
There is no more need to soothe,—
Peace herself sleeps there.
From its perch the bird has flown,
And we hold the cage alone,
And the music all is gone
From the empty air.

Lay each dear, thin, tiny hand
Gently by her side;
None will e'er their aid demand,
While the seasons glide.
Little hands have naught to do;
Little feet are idle, too;
All their baby task is through,
Ere life's toil is tried.

Must the fringed curtain draw
O'er each sweet blue eye,
Where the nestling soul we saw
In the days gone by?
Now the bird has winged its way—
Tenderly the coin-weights lay;
Father, thou hast spared for aye
Weights that heavier lie!

Lay her in the cradle-bed
That no rocking needs;
Pure and white the blossoms spread,
As her beauty pleads.
O thou Shadow of the Pall!
Shall the Gardener of all
Into nothingness let fall
Even his least of seeds?

Silence be the requiem sung
O'er our slumberer there!
Grief that kneels and finds no tongue
Be our only prayer!
O the beauty childhood gave,
Lavished on the eyeless grave!
And the all that love can save—
One dear lock of hair!

Vanished in Night's vast inane
Is our tiny spark,
And its silvern gleam again
Never shall we mark;
But, though soon its gentle rays
Paled and perished from our gaze,
Even as in the noontide blaze
God is in the Dark!

The Index.

AUGUST 13, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

The following, appended to the column of "Current Religious Views" in the last Independent, promptly corrects an omission which we were sure was accidental:—

CORRECTION.—By a strange mistake, the article on the "Bramo Somaj in India," in this department of The Independent in the issue of July 21st, was not credited, as it should have been, to the department of the Free Religious Association in the Toledo INDEX.

A private letter recently received from a Unitarian minister at the West has this passage:—"Isn't the Independent a brave and generous fellow? Our Register and Liberal Christian seem weak, narrow, timid, pitiable, beside it. I wonder how the Register ever dared to publish that exceedingly just criticism of Freeman Clarke's book, so contrary to its habit. I'll venture the reply was written when the criticism appeared." In popular estimation the Independent stands at the head of the liberal element in Protestant Christianity, and the Unitarian papers are falling fast to the rear. They distrust Liberty, and she has left them.

A SUICIDAL ARGUMENT.

In its report of the "Mass Meeting of Liberals," held in the Park on Sunday morning, July 17, the Toledo Commercial made certain criticisms on the object of the meeting which proved either an inability or an unwillingness to do it justice. The report to which we refer was printed in THE INDEX, No. 31, and we propose to say a brief word in reply.

The Commercial says that "the challenge to the best and most effective educational system the world ever saw is plain and direct." The implication is made that the meeting had its origin in hostility to this system. On the contrary, as even the brief abstract of the opening address, on which the Commercial based its criticisms, clearly showed, the meeting had its origin in a desire to avert the "alarming danger threatening this system," and to "preserve, develop, and improve it." The attempt thus made to prejudice the public against the movement by a glaring misrepresentation of its object, is too transparent to require further comment.

Twisting, furthermore, the frank statement of Mayor Kraus that even American liberty "needs some improving," the Commercial declares that the proposed improvement of our liberty amounts to "an entire change both in its mode of manifestation and its basis," because it would leave unrecognized "the religious principle in man." If American liberty requires the distinct recognition of religion in our common schools, then the American principle of the utter separation of Church and State is incompatible with American liberty; and the sooner the Commercial goes back to the Romish theory of education, the better for its self-consistency. Mayor Kraus desired a more faithful application of recognized American principles, for the sake of "improving" American liberty; while the Commercial would surrender these principles for the sake of bolstering orthodoxy.

Lastly, the Commercial asserts that "neither human nor divine power has produced" (or presumably can produce) a system of education which shall exclude whatever is a grievance to any class of the community. If this be true, every possible system of common schools must rest on injustice to some class or other. Once convince the American people of the truth of this position, and how long will it be before the common school system will be abolished? The Commercial here surrenders at discretion to the liberals. Starting with the premise that the schools must "recognize religion" (i. e. retain Bible-reading as a religious exercise), it is forced to admit that they must oppress some class or classes of the community. Precisely so. That is the very objection against Bible-reading in the schools,—the very reason why the liberals insist on its exclusion from the schools. Exclude the Bible, and what class is aggrieved? None but the Catholics—whose grievance is that the Catholic religion is not taught authoritatively in all the schools. But this is no real grievance at all, unless it be a real grievance to the Pope that we refuse to be his contented and submissive slaves. Such a grievance as this, we fancy, he must bear with what fortitude he may. But the Commercial has here put itself on record as deliberately defending a palpable injustice, on the ground that no system of free public schools can be maintained without injustice, and that the idea of maintaining a free school system which shall be just to all is a "vision" and an "illusion" which must "disappear." According to the Commercial, either injustice must be intentionally and persistently committed, or else the free school system must be abolished. Let all sincere friends of popular education make careful note of this position, and judge for themselves whether the liberals or the Commercial must be charged with the most dangerous "challenge" to the "best and most effective educational system the world ever saw." "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

The long and the short of this whole matter is that the exclusion of the Bible from the schools will remove every reasonable cause of grievance from all classes of the community; and that is why the liberals demand it, with the conviction that they thereby approve themselves the truest friends of our common school system. If the Commercial is ambitious of becoming the champion oppressor of Toledo, and the worst enemy of her free schools, let it persist in its present "protest" against justice and equal rights.

MEETING OF THE RADICAL CLUB.

According to public announcement, the Radical Club of Toledo met in Lyceum Hall, Sunday evening, August 7. The attendance was large, embracing many citizens who have never formally connected themselves with the organization. Judge Ritchie was elected chairman. After a protracted debate, the petition for the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools, reported by the Committee, was adopted as follows:—

TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY OF TOLEDO.

We, the undersigned, inhabitants of Toledo, respectfully petition the BOARD OF EDUCATION to pass regulations discontinuing the reading of the Bible, singing of hymns, offering of prayer, and all other exercises of a religious character, in the public schools of this city.

For this request we would assign the following reasons:—

1. Because universal education is the only guarantee of universal freedom; and the preservation and improvement of our common school system is the only means of ensuring universal education.
2. Because the preservation of our common school system requires the removal of every just cause of disaffection towards it.
3. Because the public schools are supported by taxes levied upon the entire community, no exemption being made on account of any religious opinions; and it is manifestly unjust that money thus raised should be used, directly or indirectly, to propagate the sectarian opinions of a part of the community.
4. Because the public schools are not a fit place for religious worship or instruction. The school funds are raised avowedly for educational purposes alone, and it is manifestly improper that they should be diverted to religious purposes.
5. Because the utter separation of Church and State is a fundamental principle of republican government; and it is a plain violation of this principle to permit public religious worship or instruction in any national, state, or municipal institution.
6. Because the reading of the Bible without note or comment is a peculiarity of Protestant Christian worship; and, when practised in the public schools, it makes them Protestant Christian schools to that extent.
7. Because the Protestant Christian character thus given to the public schools is as truly a just cause of grievance to all who are not Protestant Christians, as the Catholic Christian character which would be given to them by the daily practice of saying mass would be a just cause of grievance to all who are not Catholic Christians.

8. Because the present Protestant character of our public schools affords a plausible pretext for the dangerous demand of the Catholics for a division of the school funds; and the only way to avoid the obligation of complying with this demand is to make the schools neither Protestant nor Catholic, but purely secular.

9. Because it is essential to the very existence of our common school system, that it should scrupulously respect the equal rights of all classes of the community, and should cease to manifest the partiality which it now does manifest to Protestant Christians.

Copies of the above petition were ordered to be printed in English and German for circulation in the city. Will our liberal exchanges please give it the benefit of an insertion in their columns, and thus help to mould public opinion on this subject in the right direction?

A WOMAN'S PROTEST.

I have been boiling over ever since I read in the Woman's Journal the account of the ordinance passed by the city government of St. Louis, in regard to the women in the houses of prostitution. It is infamous, and I should think every man that is a man would want to hide his head for very shame, that such a thing could be done by anything in human shape. Isn't it enough that the women must bear all the suffering and the shame, without being forced to pay for their own degradation? If such things must be, let the men (if men they can be called) who make the women what they are pay their part, too. If these women only supply a necessary demand (and is it not recognizing it as a necessary demand to license such places?), they commit no sin, and should be looked upon as saints and martyrs rather than as outcasts; for they sacrifice all that is most precious to woman, when they enter upon such a life. And women do not do it willingly; they are forced into it, driven into it, by the very men who pass such laws against them. If it is sin, and every true man or woman believes that it is, let the penalty fall on both alike. Do not make the woman an outcast and a shame, and leave the man free to go where he will, into our homes and families, yes, even to our beds, while we can say nothing, do nothing, only be thankful that we are not forced to be like those he has already ruined. If every man who visits such places was forced to tell his true name, and have it publicly recorded, as the women are, how long would there be a need for such houses? It is because a man knows that he can go and be thought none the worse of, or that he can conceal entirely his going, that he does it. Treat the men as the women are treated, and how long would the "social evil" be the curse that it is? If I had ability to write or speak, I would not let that subject rest till I had waked up both men and women to a sense of their duty on that point.

IMPRISONMENT AND ESCAPE.

ADRIAN, MICH., July 18, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Before having heard of THE INDEX, it accidentally fell into my hands. I read it carefully and thoughtfully, especially the "Fifty Affirmations." Your definition of the true or right religion meets the approval of both my head and heart. Such a religion is intelligible and stimulating, and must eventually commend itself to every rational and unprejudiced mind. Free religion—I like the sound. It has an exhilarating effect upon the mind of, at least, one who has felt for many years the crushing weight of superstition, and experienced the ostracism sure to be visited in some shape upon him who shall dare openly to dissent from the prevailing opinions that surround him.

In my boyhood (nearly sixty years ago), Calvinism was the popular religion. The pulpit and the catechism taught vehemently the supposed important doctrines of the "covenant of particular redemption," "election," and "reprobation,"—in short, all the terms of a bargain made by word between the persons of the supposed Trinity of the Godhead ages preceding the origin of man. These doctrines, including "total depravity," made up the staple of long sermons. They were dwelt upon with pertinacity and emphasis. A sermon without them was considered by leading members of the church flat, pointless, and destitute of vitality. The fear of that dreadful hell that I was made to believe awaited and was the certain doom of the non-elect, filled my mind with terror. I wished, as well I might, I had never been born. Such doctrines chilled my soul. I floated on an iceberg in full view of a lake of fire and brimstone, into which I should be plunged at the end of my present voyage. I could get no evidence of my election, and gave up in despair.

At the age of twenty-five, having passed through many revival scenes without being converted, I began to doubt in spite of myself of the justice, and finally of the truth, of the whole scheme of salvation through a crucified Savior, or man's need of one. While absorbed with reflection upon these things, suddenly this idea flashed across my mind:—"If these doctrines be true, the whole thing is a farce played off upon mankind." I was alarmed at the thought, and quite unhappy. Years rolled by before I dared to think freely or whisper such thoughts to others. Diligent and careful study of the Bible, comparing its different and inharmonious doctrines, reading church history and other books, with thirty years of controversy and free thought upon the rights and duties of men, has prepared me for the reception of Free Religion, and THE INDEX as a teacher of it.

On immortality a celebrated writer says:—"It appears more probable to me that I shall continue to exist hereafter, than that I should have had existence as I now have before that existence began." Here I rest the subject with no fears of the future, and endeavor to adapt myself to the present state as the best preparation for the next. P.

[This simple narrative, so full of pathos to one who can comprehend it, reminds us of the similar experience related by Horace Mann, whose early life was embittered and darkened by the same terrible influence of Orthodoxy. Such cases are almost numberless. Who shall say that Free Religion has no beneficent work to do, so long as Orthodoxy continues to cast a pitchy gloom over the sun in heaven and extinguish all the light and beauty of human existence? In vain do we seek to throw off all responsibility for others. He who has light owes it to his race; he who is free violates a sacred duty, if he is contented with his own freedom alone. It was the favorite text of old John Brown—"Remember those in bonds as bound with them." Every great life marches to the same grand music.—Ed.]

PIOUS FRAUDS.

MR. ABBOT:—

Lying for the glory of God, and the welfare of the Church, is a practice of long standing in this lower world. Mosheim, the standard ecclesiastical historian, informs us that in the first century of the Christian era spurious gospels and epistles, ascribed to Apostles and other holy men, were forged, and had great currency among the ignorant and credulous. To such an extent had this practice been carried that at the Council of Nice, when the canon of Scripture was settled, the apocryphal writings were almost as voluminous as the others. Men never seemed to doubt that, if ever the good of religion appeared to require it, lying to the ear and forging to the eye were pious acts. The Catholics, who derive great spiritual good, in their way, from contemplating the relics of dead saints, have in the various churches of Europe no less than five heads of John the Baptist, and it is said miracles of healing have been wrought by each of them. In like manner, and on the same authority, wonderful things have been done by the sacred toe-nails of Saint Bridget, as well as by the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius of Naples.

One would suppose that the Protestants, sickened at the universal and unscrupulous lying that prevailed in the Church for 1500 years under the guise of holy zeal, would have given it up as a means of grace, and for the advancement of Christianity; and would have trusted God and Truth. But they did not. This part of the Popish system they retained. When Luther, in his translation of the New Testament, notified the world that in his judgment the Apocalypse had no claims to inspiration, and warned all who reprinted it to say so, his successors practised the pious fraud of suppressing the truth in the case; and so, when in his grave and unable to protest against the wrong, he is made to endorse an error of the greatest magnitude. The authorities of the Episcopal Church, in altering the picture of Ary Scheffer, "Christus Consolator," to make it agree with the tone of American pro slavery religion—the American Tract Society and the American Sunday School Union, by altering and interpolating the works of living and deceased authors in the service of slavery,—all practised unblushingly the sin of pious frauds.

Two instances of this kind of religious lying have recently occurred. The first is the case of the Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations which met at Indianapolis, and adopted a policy in regard to the colored people which was clearly atheistic and anti-Christian, declaring in effect that to be unclean which God and the Constitution of the United States had pronounced clean. And then, when detected and exposed in their treason to humanity, instead of revoking their action with confession of wrongdoing, they persisted in their iniquity; and yet, for all that, got down on their knees before the Press like a set of white-livered cowards, and begged it not to notice their dereliction of principle and blazon it before an ungodly world.

Now what kind of morals do these young men inculcate upon their fellows? What kind of a God do they worship? Is he any better than Baal? Evidently they think he can be hoodwinked and cajoled. For when, in their worse than infidelity, their hearts became as ice towards their black brethren in Christ who were struggling out from under the load of two centuries of oppression, and needed sympathy and help, did not God see them refusing both? Elijah at Mount Carmel told the Prophets of Baal, when their god seemed to disregard them,—"Cry aloud: for he is a god; perhaps he is gone on a journey, or is asleep and needs to be awakened." Was the god of the Young Men's Christian Association sleeping when they turned a deaf ear to the cries of his black children? How true it is that every man makes his own divinity, and then worships him! And if so, what a mean, dirty, sneaking, lying god the Young Men's Christian Association worship!

The other case of religious forgery and counterfeiting is that of the officers of the Evangelical Alliance in publishing the following document:—

WASHINGTON, May 10th.—Having heard of the intended general conference of eminent divines, learned professors and others, from foreign countries and our own, to be held in New York in September next, under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, we have great pleasure in expressing our interest in that important assemblage of great and good men, our approval of the objects contemplated by it, and the hope that its deliberations may tend to the advancement of civil and religious liberty and the promotion of peace and good-will among men.

U. S. GRANT, President of the United States.
SCHUYLER COLFAX, Vice-President.
HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

Now, although it was a most unwise act in Messrs. Grant, Colfax and Fish to sign such a paper at all, the paper itself is a forgery, as clearly as it would be in a man who would alter a ten dollar bill by annexing three noughts and making its value ten thousand. Three zeros don't amount to anything, and how can they increase the value of a note? But let a man try it, and, if justice has its way, he will in due time have the privilege of conversing with his friends for some years through the grated doors of the penitentiary. So the President and Vice President of the United States and the Secretary of State did not sign the document presented to them. Messrs. Grant, Colfax and Fish, however, most inconsiderately did. But the officers of the Alliance practised the pious fraud of forging the official titles of these men, and affixing them to their signatures. The titles themselves are mere printed words, and of no more account than the three noughts of the counterfeiter; but by publishing them as they have, they have given official importance to an act the bad effects of which will be seen after many days. For when the Hon. Patrick O'Flaherty shall be elected President of the United States, and Dennis McGuire Vice President, and Charles O'Connor shall be made Secretary of State, and a Provincial Council shall be called by the Catholic Archbishops to meet in New York, and a similar document to the one I criticise shall be published, giving the official countenance of the highest functionaries of the Government to the Roman Catholic religion, in opposition to Protestantism and other forms of belief or disbelief, what a hole there will be from Protestant Dan even unto Beersheba!

I read the papers generally, and am astonished to see that in none, either secular or religious, has there been a proper reproof of the conduct of the three highest officers of the Government for this tremendous blunder except by the wide-awake and brave New York Independent [and THE INDEX for July 16.] The Catholics have quietly laid away the rod in pickle for the backs of the Protestants, when they get the upper-hand, as they vainly suppose they will in process of time; while the short-sighted Protestants, apparently thinking there are not going to be many more years before the second coming of Christ to put down the Pope as the Man of Sin and the Son of Perdition, are congratulating themselves in Europe and America that their fraudulent zeal will rebound to the glory of God, and the good of the Evangelical Church. And Messrs. Grant, Colfax and Fish, although they must have seen the forgery, and must know that it establishes a precedent full of evil to the country in the future, connive at the outrage and let it pass unrebuked!

But the point I make is this, that the moral turpitude of this act of forgery is greater than if they had forged the signatures to a Government Bond and given it currency. In the case of a bond for a thousand dollars, these gentlemen in England, had they lived in the days of the Rev. Dr. Dodd, would have met his fate on the gallows; and by our laws would now be sent to the penitentiary to learn the art and mystery of weaving rag-carpet. But having only committed the forgery for the glory of God and the welfare of our beloved Zion—having only obliterated the eternal distinction between truth and falsehood, and taught the world the innocence of lying,—these clerical gentlemen will wipe their mouths as if they had done nothing amiss, and receive the plaudits of their Jesuitical brethren for their zeal. BEZA.

THE COALITION OF SECTS.

ED. INDEX:—In the editorial columns of one of your cotemporarys there recently appeared the following:—

The London Times calls attention to a significant occurrence recently in Henry VII. Chapel in Westminster Abbey. The company of learned men called together to revise the authorized version of the New Testament participated, with a few exceptions, in the Holy Communion. Of those who had come together for that purpose, twenty joined in the solemn services, among whom were Bishops of the Established Church, ministers of the Established and of the Free Church of Scotland, and representatives of nearly every Non-Conformist Church in England—Independent, Baptist, Wesleyan, and Unitarian. This union of the Church and of Non-Conformity suggests the charity and the advanced views of the times, and the decay of old religious feuds. There is, of course, such a thing as being too liberal, and of admitting away Christianity and being at peace with infidels, but this is not the purpose or tendency of liberal Christians, and the more charity there is between those who belong to the class called "orthodox," the sooner will come the triumph of the religion which is revolutionizing and vitalizing the world.

This tendency to union is shown probably as much by the fact that over forty men from different branches of the Christian Church have come together to revise the King James version of the Bible, as from any other event or movement of the times. It is true, Dr. NEWMAN, the learned Catholic convert, and Dr. PUSEY, the High Churchman, declined to join the army of revision; yet a Committee composed of representatives of most of the Protestant churches is earnestly engaged in a revision of the accepted version of the Bible.

The revision was proposed by the Convocation of Canterbury, and has no authority whatever except such as this body can give it, for the Convocation of York, which is equal in authority, refused its assent to the revision with great unanimity.

"The union of the Church and Non-Conformity." This "significant occurrence,"—the more remarkable because the door of Christian fellowship was so widely opened as to allow even the Unitarian black sheep, heretofore wandering among outcast goats, to enter,—suggests to the writer of the above the "charity and advanced views of the times," and the "decay of religious feuds." Christians, it would seem, content with the blood already plentifully spilled in the service of the Prince of Peace, are to quit quarrelling among themselves, and henceforth exhibit the harmony and enjoy the bliss of a "happy family." But let no deluded mortal consider the charity spoken of as sufficiently comprehensive to include infidels in its generous embrace! Is it not enough for Christians to be at peace with themselves?

Probably the "advanced views of the times" may suffice to save the infidel from being murdered, imprisoned, plundered, and shown other such gentle attentions, for the "love of Christ" and "glory of God," as in by-gone times; but ere the hour let him not presumptuously hope for charity and peace which shall witness the lying down together of lion and lamb! That, indeed, would be "too liberal." And, besides, how much of the occupation of our clerical Othellos would be gone, if there were to be a truce to the petty persecutions covertly incited against unbelievers, the manifold misrepresentations and stale slanders heaped upon the head of Voltaire, Volney, Hume, Gibbon, Paine, et id genus omne! Or if the death of noted infidels by lightning, drowning, and other casualties, even by a sudden attack of heart-disease, could not be "improved" as a "special visitation from Providence!"

Nevertheless, while the writer of the paragraph quoted sees nothing that promises peace for unbelievers in the "significant" assemblage of divines to revise God's Word—to which the addition, or from which the subtraction, of even one jot, dot or iota is therein forbidden,—he does perceive, in the unsectarian character of the gathering, a "tendency to union shown probably as much as from any other event or movement of the times." But what of the declaration to share this revision of the Bible by Dr. Newman, Dr. Pusey and the Convocation of York? Is not the hypothesis of this tendency to re-union,—is not, at any rate, the supposition that it will eventuate in union among Christians, rather a fiction of imagination than an inference of reason? For, after the revision of the Bible, they will have, as in the past, substantially the same book. And has their use of it heretofore, the "sure word" though it be, united them? On the contrary, it is a notorious fact, and one often remarked upon, that the believers in the plenary inspiration and absolute authority of the Bible have found therein almost countless causes of difference and contention. Thus, to enumerate some of them, they have deduced therefrom a belief alike in one God, and in three equal, co-existent, co-eternal Gods in one; in total depravity and partial depravity; in election and free grace; in salvation by the blood and death, and salvation through the life and example of Christ; in faith as opposed to works and in works as opposed to faith; in the presence and absence of the veritable body of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's supper; in baptism by sprinkling and by immersion; in standing and sitting in prayer; in the first day of the week and in the seventh as the Sabbath; in revivals and no revivals; in one well-nigh almighty devil and no devil at all; in heaven for a few and heaven for all; in hell for many and no hell for any; and in many other different and contradictory observances, rites and dogmas. So the rejection of riches and the pursuit of wealth; amusements and asceticism; total abstinence and the taking of a "little wine for thy stomach's sake;" war and peace; resistance and non-resistance; slavery and freedom; aristocracy and democracy; no government for any and the most despotic government for all; the divine right of kings and the divine right of the regicide; the having of many wives, of only one, and of none,—these have all been advocated, vindicated, and justified, as unerringly revealed in God's law! Well might Shelley exclaim—"If God has spoken, why is not the universe convinced?"

Thus it has been in the past, so it will be in the future. Even if it be admitted that the Bible is the infallible word of God, still it is fallible man who interprets and expounds it. The book is to every man what his understanding of it is. When, therefore, he believes in it as infallible, he believes in his own understanding of it as infallible. But the minds of men differ. They cannot reason wholly alike. There must, therefore, be different expositions of what the Scriptures teach. And because the distinguishing doctrine of every sect is the result of its own reasoning, its dogma becomes, in the last analysis, the absolute authority to which it submits as the very word of Jehovah. And thus there are and must be many different standards of authority drawn from the same source. There is, then, no escape from disagreement and discord among Protestant sects, except by providing for them what the Catholics have at last secured, one infallible interpreter and expounder of the Bible. Even then disunion would exist between Protestants and Catholics. We may conclude, therefore, that the "tendency" toward it will not effect a real union among Christians.

What, then, is the meaning of the tendency which is indicated by the meeting of the forty gentlemen to inspect and revise the Almighty's Word, by the formation of Christian Associations, Evangelical Alliances, &c. &c. Simply that all Orthodoxy is alarmed, and is making a desperate effort to rally and concentrate its forces to oppose the irresistible movement of mankind toward mental freedom. What of it? "Mr. Stevenson, suppose your locomotive at full speed encountered a cow upon the track, what then?" "So much the worse for the cow." SPECTATOR.

THE GERMAN WAR.

"There is no remission of sins save through the shedding of blood,"—is the declaration of the Bible, and nations at least seem to attest its truth. Of all the hopes sent out like doves across the wide waste of waters least likely for many a long day to bring back any olive branch, of all the plans with which this effervescing generation restlessly struggles for human improvement, none seems to me more Utopian and hopeless of speedy results than Peace Societies, or schemes for universal disarmament.

Once more the tocsin has sounded to arms, and peals across the Atlantic. France and Prussia are the active combatants, with more than a chance that other nations will be drawn in. Like a sudden flash of lightning on a summer's day, came first the declaration of war, and almost as soon the thunder of immense moving armies,—France with 400,000 troops under arms, and 260,000 reserves, Prussia with 200,000 and a reserve force of 600,000.

The most significant fact elicited by the war, and the most complete revelation of Napoleon's character, is the secret treaty of which our papers have been full. If anything had been needed to make complete the sympathy of all Liberals with Prussia, this would have completed it. A little volume by Victor Hugo, describing the coup d'état by which the Emperor ascended the throne, should be read now, and in connection with it the pledge he took in 1848:—

"I appear before you as a warm and true Democrat and Republican. I take the shadow of the man of the century as the symbol of the promise which I now solemnly make. I will be, as I always was, a child of France. In every Frenchman I will ever see a brother. The Democratic Republic is the object of my adoration, and I will be her Minister. Never will I try to clothe myself in Imperial robes. May my heart cease to beat on the day when I forget what I owe to you—what I owe to France. May my lips forever be closed, if I say a word against the Republican Sovereignty of the French people. May I be cursed if I suffer doctrines to be taught in my name contrary to Democratic principles and the government of the Republic. May I be condemned if I lay a treasonable hand upon the rights of the people, either with their consent or against their will by force. And now trust me, and I trust you, and may this call from me be like a prayer to Heaven. Vive la République." LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

And yet, at this man's bidding and on the flimsiest of pretexts, this great French nation have rushed into a long war,—at least the Emperor promises it shall be such. Every telegram for several days came laden with accounts of their enthusiasm. In nothing do we more clearly show our brute parentage than in the instinct with which nations spring to arms, with the roar with which we fancy tigers meet and, clinching, roll together in the dust. And so great masses of men, the most expensive product of nature, become mere food for powder. Only a great cause makes such things endurable; but what does France fight for? What idea causes the enthusiasm with which she has rushed to arms?

Something of the feeling that, having begun the war, the Glory of France demands that it be vigorously carried on; something of the conflict of races; but most of all, it seems to me, the savage instinct which, in the earliest history of our race (whether myth or revelation it is all the same for our purpose), appeared in the killing of the second man born by the hand of his brother—the childish, savage instinct, which glories in the pomp and tinsel of war, and the perilous craving of every soul for intense excitement. One of the saddest of sights is the facility with which a tyrant can use a people's love of country, its prejudice against another nation, and the primal instinct of war to advance schemes of conquest which every wise man deprecates.

Meantime the troubled nations stand around necessarily partaking more or less in the shock and disaster. Whatever Napoleon may say about long wars, yet the intimate union of all countries to-day, their interdependence, and the great evil to all of war against any, is the pledge that insures to us its speedy ending. Long wars are too costly to our modern civilization, and commerce protests. It is no longer possible for nations to issue like feudal barons from their castles, and leading their subjects into war, bear alone the losses and defeats. As once they kindled fires upon the mountains, and fiery tongues that cried from hill to hill told the people that war was commenced, so to the watchful eyes of the world this war seems to spread from nation to nation, or, like volcanoes bursting suddenly forth at places far asunder, hints at some fire near the centre that is thinly covered, never quenched.

In Spain a Carlist outbreak is momentarily expected, and every preparation is made to meet it. England, professing strict neutrality, declares through her papers that no attempt shall be made to redistribute European territory or reconstruct the map of Europe without her consent; and men in Parliament talked with bated breath of the secret treaty, till war seemed at their very door. The French troops are leaving Rome, and a rising among the loving subjects of the Pope is already threatened. Never was anything more timely than the declaration of Papal infallibility just now. More than human wisdom will be required for the old gentleman to keep his throne; and this, happily, has been voted him by the (Ecumenical Council. I can but think, however, that a vote of bayonets would have been more to the purpose. The hour so long delayed for Italy has struck at length; she has but to will it to be free and united. There is a great unrest among the nations; this new effervescing wine cannot be put into the old bottles. It seems as if in this upheaving of life some new form would be put on,—as if the institutions and forms that belonged to old, dead centuries would fall off, and leave the new idea free to run its course. The danger is that, like Samson, with eyes put out by their cruel masters, they may pull down the temple on their own heads.

Napoleon himself sits to-day on an unsteady throne. Partly to keep his hold on France this war is made; but, beside that, he desires to prevent a united Germany, the great hope of Bismarck. The weakness of Germany has always been in her division; divided, she can never be free.

Germany was once a power in the councils of Western Christendom. From the 10th to the 14th century, from Henry the Fowler to Charles the Fourth, especially with the Suabian Emperors, Germany was the supreme secular power. Why did that power decline? Because the process of consolidation or gathering together which made England out of the Saxon Heptarchy, and Spain out of Castile and Arragon, and has made the strength of all modern nations, was never till now attempted in Germany. Strong as she is in science and art, the teacher of the world, she has not yet learned the secret of political success, or at least has not applied it. Bismarck is now eager to try consolidation. As a political power, the very existence of Germany depends on its success. As a nation she must accept the modern method of the would-be strong. That success Napoleon is determined to nip in the bud.

A learned professor in Göttingen, arguing with Dr. Hedge, said that Germany was destined to be a Bundesstaat—that is, a bundle of states. Said Dr. Hedge in reply, "Mr. Professor, your country has had now a thousand years of Bundesstaat, and nothing but political weakness has come of it. Is it not worth while to try what virtue there may be in consolidation?"

But there is something real behind this disunion; it is simply the expression of religious differences. All efforts towards the union of North and South Germany have always been frustrated by the differences of confession, and because the German Reformation was arrested in its career. All thoughtful men have long acknowledged that, before the Germans can be politically free, they must be spiritually free; before they can be united some common ground must be found to unite on. Towards this position the spirit of the age is fast hurrying them, and this war is the inevitable conflict of ideas, which work themselves out with unerring logic. On one side Romanism, on the other side Protestantism,—on one side authority, on the other reason; and the terrible masked batteries of the gods work behind the shallow ambitions of men. It is significant that the Papal dogma of infallibility has just been promulgated to organize all the forces of the church, the solitary protest of Romanism voicing itself in Hyacinthe. By a sure instinct men have grouped themselves around the poles of religious thought; and, England and America with Prussia, Ireland and Russia with France, we stand waiting the result. For out of this stern agony we hope will be born at last a free and united Germany. But who knows what must be first? Sure of ultimate success, I do not look forward to speedy results. If Judaism had first "to be pounded in the terrible mortar of history," and so many nations pulverized, that by the union of the particles a soil sufficiently rich might be obtained for the seed of Christianity to grow in, how many currents and counter currents must there be, how many bloody revolutions and wars, how many tides that bring in only phantom ships and solitary mariners, before the world or even this small corner of it is ready for free thought and religion!

Heine, with his incomparable wit, said:

"The Englishman loves liberty like his lawful wife; the Frenchman loves her like his mistress; the German loves her like his old grandmother. But yet, after all, no one can ever tell how things may fall out. The grumpy Englishman, in an ill temper with his wife, is capable of some day putting a rope round her neck, and taking her to be sold at Smithfield. The inconstant Frenchman may become unfaithful to his adored mistress, and be seen fluttering about the Palais Royal after another. But the German will never quite abandon his old grandmother; he will always keep for her a nook by the chimney corner, where she can tell her fairy stories to the listening children."

Grand, imaginative, pedantic Germany! something more than fireside tales must liberty tell to you, before the stern hold of your master relaxes.

"For thou, my people, art the true Kaiser, the true lord of the land; thy will is sovereign, and more legitimate far than that purple Tel est notre plaisir. . . . Though now thou liest down in thy bonds, yet in the end will thy rightful cause prevail; the day of deliverance is at hand, a new time is beginning. My Kaiser, the night is over, and out there glows the ruddy dawn. Hush, that is the saw and the carpenter's axe, and soon the doors of thy prison will be burst open, and thou will be free, my Kaiser!"

In the whistling of shot and shell, in the noise of musket and cannon, we hear the axe which is battering down the prison door that keeps you slave, oh Kaiser. "The people have time enough, they are immortal; kings only are mortal."

President Lincoln's religious opinions have been discussed in many quarters since the publication of Mr. Herndon's paper in THE INDEX, attempting to prove him an unbeliever in Christianity. It seems to be proved that in his early life such was his position; but that it was materially modified in his later life.—Independent.

DISCOURSE OF KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

We gladly devote our space this week to a report of a discourse delivered in the Unitarian Chapel, Finsbury, England, by Keshub Chunder Sen. The report, with the sketch of the distinguished Hindu reformer, is taken from the Borough of Hackney Express :—

Babu Keshub Chunder Sen is the descendant of a respectable and well-known lineage in Calcutta, and his grandfather was the friend and coadjutor of one of the most profound Sanscrit scholars in this country—the late Dr. Gilchrist. He belongs to the section of the Hindu community which represents the physician caste. As an orphan he went to an English school, and afterwards to a Calcutta college, where he gained a full knowledge of the English language, literature, and history, with which it was impossible he could remain in idolatry. Early in his career he therefore learned to despise the worship of idols, and by degrees, by thought and prayer, he came to believe in the One God. He then joined the party which is known in Lower India as the Brahmo Somaj (Church of God.) After a short time he became the head of the Reforming party which has now arisen in Bengal. The movement is leavening Hindu society, especially amongst the middle classes. It was impossible for these reformers to remain idolaters, and at present they consist of two classes—the Rationalistic and Theistic. Mr. Sen believes in pure Theism, but he does not ignore the teachings of Christ and His disciples. His visit to this country is not for pleasure, or to make money; but he has come (to use his own words) to tell Englishmen and women what they have done for India—to bring the heart-felt thanks of 180 millions of his countrymen for the great moral and religious reform which the English have commenced there and carried on during the last few years.

The service commenced with an invocation to the Divine Being, and singing by a choir, after which Mr. Sen read several selections from the Hindu, Jewish, Mahometan, and Parsee Scriptures, with a view, we presume, of showing the similarity of their moral teaching. Another hymn was sung, followed by a short but impressive prayer, and

Mr. Sen then said he should take as the basis of his discourse, two texts—one from the Indian and one from the Christian Scriptures: "As the bee gathereth from all flowers, so the truly wise receive truth from all scriptures great or small." "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him." He proceeded to say that an impartial survey of all the religious ceremonies and practices of all nations, and a dispassionate study of their sacred writings, would convince us that truth is not, nor has it ever been, the monopoly of any school or sect. Like light and air, truth is to be found amongst all mankind, in all nations and in all climes. Man claimed it as his birthright, and there was nothing to prevent him having it if he was only willing to find it out himself. Truth, essentially considered, was neither Hindu nor European—neither Christian nor Mahometan; it is not a thing which belonged exclusively to the first century nor to the nineteenth. It is not a thing which belonged exclusively to the rich or to the poor; it belonged to both, and it is a thing in which the Englishmen and the Hindu might feel equal interest. When we came to analyse the sacred books of various denominations, we found that truth to be historically corroborated which we found a priori in our moral constitutions. The grounds of all truths were to be found in the human mind—they were inherent in our nature; and those moral teachings which came from conscience and which were the voice of God in the soul, were to be found in the sacred books of other nations and races as well as our own. The pure moral teaching of the New Testament, had its response in the earliest books of the Hindus; and one was led to wonder how it was that the same truth could have revealed itself unto men in such distant ages and in such distant countries. But all distance of space and time was absolutely destroyed and annihilated when we sat before our Divine Father and received from His hand direct communication of truth. The fact of receiving a pound from the hands of a rich man did not enhance its value in the least; nor did the fact of receiving it from the hands of a poor man deteriorate its value. It was a pound whether it came from the rich or poor, Hindu or Christian, European or American, Jew or Gentile. So truth was truth whether found in the Scriptures of the Hindus or found in some modern books of sermons, or criticisms from the pen of Christian authors in England. All such books were to be respected by us because they contained truth. After enlarging upon this point, he said his subject was Theism in East and West—Theism in England and India. When he threw away all the prejudices and all distinctive doctrines of parties, sects, and schools, and all that was peculiar to country and race—when he stood upon the broad platform of truth and universal liberality, he found that India taught him Theism and England taught him Theism. As a member of the Brahmo Somaj, he stood between the East and the West. The true Theist found it morally and spiritually impossible, both for his own interests and the interests of mankind at large, to sell his heart to either the East or to the West. It was not for him to be anti-Christian or anti-Hindu, but a true worshipper and lover of God. The liberal-minded Theist must always ignore sectarianism, and must assume an attitude of brotherhood to all sects and nations. Wherever there was truth, there he must hear it, whether it came from Christian books or from Hindu books; then why should we reject books simply because they did not belong to our nationality? In every book, side by side with truth, there was a quantity of error; in each sect, mingled with the voice of God, there was the voice of man; and it was our duty to separate the chaff from the wheat—our interest to throw aside darkness, and prejudice, and sin, and accept that only which was true and which ennobled our hearts. In the Hindu books there were many errors and prejudices, and there were frightful and injurious customs inculcated; but he was bound to set his face against them, though they were time-hallowed—though they were to some extent grown into him because of his nationality. But what was true he accepted, and he humbly besought those present to do the same, even though it came from the East. The texts which he had read showed that even the Hindus were alive to the importance of gathering what was true from all Scriptures; they were taught to harmonize the teachings of Scripture, the counsels of good and great men, and their own intuitions. According to the light of the Hindu Scriptures these three teachings were to be brought into harmony with one another. Many Christians had accused his countrymen of teaching idolatry. He admitted there was a great deal of idolatry in India; but if they turned to the early books of the Hindu Scriptures, they would find a statement to the effect that those objects which were worshipped by men were not the true objects of Deity. Those early writings positively asserted that the Lord our God is one, and there is no other God but one. That passage most clearly protested against the finite objects which were worshipped in India. Between that statement and the passage in our Old Testament—"Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord"—there was no difference; both were true; both taught the same God, and that He is one. In Hindustan there was the system of caste, which created barriers between man and man, and woman and woman. It set up a line of demarcation between sect and sect, and race and race. But men whose hearts were catholic looked upon all as their kinsmen. The Hindu books were inimical to caste; and though caste had sprung up and had proved most mischievous and injurious to the physical and moral interests of the nation, yet there was a statement calling upon men to look upon one another as brethren. Similar statements were to be found in the Christian Scriptures. Some admitted there was Theism in India, and that there were doctrines teaching brotherhood; but urged that there was no pure theology in such books. He believed that pure Theistic morality was to be found in Hindu Scriptures, and a few passages from them would convince his hearers that that was true and indubitable. The Christian Scriptures said "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God;" and it was said in the Hindu Scripture "That the householder should do everything to the glory of God; he should give to God all his works." That showed that in our domestic life every work we did must be done to the glory of God. That was the highest aim of our existence. What did we live for in this world? Was it that we might worship God once in the course of the week, and give a portion of our life and love? No; but that every duty we did might be to the glory of God, whether it were eating or drinking, whether engaged in philanthropy or patriotism, in the reading of books or the acquiring of riches—everything was to be done in the name of God and to His glory. Thus the Christian Scriptures harmonized with the Hindu Scriptures. Truth was valued above all things in the Hindu Scriptures; truth was God, truth was the only eternal prayer, truth was the only religious ceremony, truth was the only eternal Scripture. It had been said "that the highest kind of love was not to be found in the Hindu books—that love to God was inculcated but not the highest kind of love to man. That there was no true philanthropy, no forgiveness; that the love to an enemy was a doctrine not preached in India, that it was only to be found in the Christian Scripture."

There was in the Hindu Scriptures, he said, a passage, the sublimity of which he had never been able thoroughly to grasp. It said, "When an enemy comes to your house, show him the utmost hospitality; for the tree does not deny its shade to the man who feels it." When a man cut down a tree, he continued to enjoy the shade which it afforded even whilst engaged in the work of destruction. So should a man treat his enemy. He should show hospitality, he should continue to give protection to the man. Even when another was trying to destroy us, we should not keep from him our loving-kindness and hospitality. In the epistle to the Romans we were told to be not overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good. A similar passage was given in the Hindu Scripture, "Conquer anger with kindness; conquer malevolence with kindness; conquer untruth with truth." We were not told to return anger for anger—not to follow the law of retaliation, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." Both passages breathed the same spirit—the sublime spirit of forgiveness and universal love. Some complained that the Hindu Scriptures taught dry and hard moral duty, but that there was no tenderness. His opinion was that they overflowed with tenderness and love. Love to God in all its fulness was to be found in the Hindu books. They taught that the Lord that dwells within our hearts is dearer to us than all things else, and that he who wishes to worship God must worship Him not as an abstraction, not as an intellectual duty, but as a God to be loved, a God who is dear to us. We must worship Him as some one dearer to us than son, or father, or mother, or our best friends on earth; dearer than luxuries or anything in the world. We were not taught to believe that God's spirit was a sort of abstraction, having nothing to do with the arrangements of the world or the destinies of its inhabitants; but that the Lord regulates the physical machinery of the universe; that the same God is to us our friend, our Savior, our preserver, and our protector; and if we wish to draw near to Him, we must worship Him with our hearts, and not merely with the understanding. Thus as regarded the conception of God and our duty to Him there was Theism in India and Theism in England. What was the inference to be drawn from those facts? A perusal of the Hindu books would satisfy them that there was pure Theism in India. This was being developed by the Brahmo Somaj. They were trying to give Theism a tangible organization; they were trying to unite themselves into a band of lovers of man and worshippers of God. Might he ask those present to do the same thing here? It distressed him to find in this country so many who had drifted away from the Christian church. Thousands were going about here and there, wanderers; men who had no spiritual home where they could find comfort—where they could find peace to their hearts. Was it not our duty to bring these men and women together? If there were strife, and contention, and discord in the Established Church in England,—if there were sects warring against one another in Christendom,—if members of certain churches did not care to bring harmony amongst themselves, should he find the same spirit among liberal-minded Christians of the present day? Their duty was to convince others that their hearts were more loving,—that they had cast away so-called orthodox doctrines and narrowness of heart. Those present stood before the Lord their Father, and they desired to acknowledge Him not as a Lord of that small portion of Finsbury, but as the Lord of the universe. They desired to gather, not simply the five hundred souls there, but all races of men, and to acknowledge God as their one common shepherd. That was their duty,—that was the object they had in view; and he hoped that they would not mar that object,—that they would not sully that object, by mutual discord and antipathy, which he saw in great abundance among men who had a narrow creed. Such men were necessarily confined by sectarianism, because their creed was narrow; but if his hearers said they had accepted the truth as their only scriptures,—if they were willing to accept truth wherever it was to be found,—whether in Hindu, or English, or other books,—should not their hearts show a commensurate amount of catholicity? Should not their hearts grow as their minds expanded? Should they not receive an enlarging love to their hearts,—love that expanded the whole heart, and enabled it to embrace all the nations of the earth?

After enlarging on the evils of dividing into sects and cherishing a bitter dogmatic spirit,—

He urged them to be engaged in a holy crusade against sectarianism—not to establish a new church, for they had too many isms already, and they were determined to have no more. They wished to bring together the various sects, and incorporate them into a harmonious whole, so that a new life might be infused, a new kind of faith, and a new kind of worship might spring up—a form of worship which should gather together the truths which were to be found in the various books spread over the earth. Thus they would accept the truth of all, and whilst they were apparently hostile to other sects, inwardly and spiritually they would possess hearts loving and forgiving, which would extend to others the right hand of fellowship. Thus might the true Scriptures, the Hindu and the Christian, coalesce and harmonize; and thus might the English and the Hindu heart be united together in love and fellowship, and England accept the noble Theism. And thus might the East and the West be bound together in the enduring ties of brotherly love; and that would be the cathedral where all nations and races should sing the name of our common Father.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

NOISE.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., July 15, 1866.]

"Be still, and know that I am God."

PSALM 46:10.

All barbarous nations and tribes are fond of noise. The greatest of their divinities is the god Racket. At their feasts and public assemblies their joys find vent in shrieks, cries, and universal uproar; in their war-councils every campaign is planned under the inspiration of wild whoops and terrific clamor. The Indians endeavor to cure their sick by assembling in crowds, and scaring away the disease by sheer force of noise. The Chinese, before contact with European troops had taught them better, are said to have put greater faith in their kettle-drums than in their swords as weapons of war. Some African tribes, when the moon is eclipsed, meet together in dismay, and with pipes, horns, drums, groans and yells, seek to drive off the dreadful beast they suppose to be devouring her. Noise seems to be the universal expression among uncivilized men for any strong emotion of joy, fear, rage, or grief; and even among civilized nations the same taste seems to linger, as if to remind them of their savage ancestry. Even in this highly-enlightened America we can find no better expression of our public happiness than the snapping of torpedoes and fire-crackers, the clangor of bells, the thunder of cannon, and the still noisier demonstrations of Fourth-of-July orators. There is no more sweet, natural, and appropriate interpreter of strong feeling than noise, provided it is organized and harmonized into music; it utters for us, far better than articulate speech, our rejoicings, our sorrows, our hopes, our despairs, our aspirations. But noise, vulgar and unmeaning,—noise which is simply din, without pathos, beauty, or fire,—is not an expression of feeling, but rather a substitute for it. Beauty, whether in sight or sound, is the true symbol of our secret delights and pains; but a mere grinding of discord out of Nature's reluctant elements symbolizes nothing, and becomes the veriest travesty of feeling. In proportion as men learn to think truly and feel deeply, they also learn to shun the parade and ostentation of noise,—to understand and enjoy the eloquence of silence.

For every one who has outgrown the child and the savage, there is a commanding beauty in stillness, at least at certain seasons. Noise is superficial,—silence is profound. You know the old proverb—"Still waters run deep." It is the shallow soul that noisily ripples all its experiences into every ear; the soul that ponders the great Sphinx-enigma of life is still. Some persons, after a fine song or grand strain of orchestral music, fly into a rhapsody of exclamation and rattle off adjectives like summer rain. Of course the next moment brings oblivion of that which was just now so glibly praised. Others before a splendid sunset, a lovely scene, or a great work of art, can find self-complacency enough with stereotyped phrases to simper forth their shallow admiration. There are times when to speak at all is insufferable impertinence. We feel ourselves outraged by him who has either no comprehension of the sacredness of the occasion, or else no respect for the emotions it calls forth. A well-meaning comforter, in hours of great and terrible bereavement, may put us to torture more sharp and excruciating than that of the rack. Our best consolers are those who best know the healing power of silence, and never venture to talk about things too deep for words; whose hearts are so full of sympathy that it can find no outlet in set phrase or formal speech, but only in looks and tones and delicate acts of kindness. The droning commonplaces of professional or conventional comforters are harsher to a wounded spirit than the creaking of rusty hinges, or the dull cawing of a November crow. No noise is so harrowing to the nerves as mere words. It is truer than ever in times of trouble that "speech is silver, but silence is golden."

The need of stillness grows out of our highest nature. The glimpse of great truths does not come to us in a riot or tumult, but only in the deep hush of a pondering and reverential spirit. God never reveals himself to us with a flourish of trumpets; he has never issued an official proclamation. When our hearts are still, the great Presence is known. If you are inwardly filled with a clamor of passions or ambitions, you live in a hubbub, although outwardly all is hushed as the grave; your hearing of the eternal word is stunned and deafened, not by the roar of business or the clatter of trade, but by the importunate outcries of selfish plans, policies, and lusts. The only uproar which drowns the whisper of the still, small voice within is the terrible concert of the wild beasts of the breast. The howlings of the passions make worse confusion in our souls than the shouts of a hundred hack-drivers in a New York railroad station.

Jesus knew well the conditions of a true communion with the Infinite. "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet; and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which seeth in secret." "Thy closet,"—what is that? The stillness of a soul at peace with itself, in which every evil thought and disorderly impulse and ignoble purpose are shut out, and the door bolted and barred,—that inward retreat from the tyrannies of life in which, loud as may be the noises round about us, we may always feel the deep pulsations of the Infinite Heart. Friends, this noise of the world would drive us crazy, if we could not flee away at intervals into the absolute solitude of our own souls. The keen chafferings of trade, the loud rivalries of business interests, the din and clack of vociferous tongues, the shrill pipings of penny-whistles blown by boys of all ages from seven to seventy years, the noisy scrambling after a pile of greenbacks, or a public office or an enviable position, the deafening competition of men and women, aye, and children too, for the so-called "prizes of life,"—how utterly tiresome, perplexing, and unendurable would be this ceaseless noise, if there were no closet for quiet thought and silence and secret refreshment in the still chambers of the soul! The meaning of life is not on its surface, and we should fail to seize it, if we never descended to its depths. In the profound hush of meditation, we learn that there is more of human life than meets the eye or ear; we catch the murmurs of truth's mighty ocean, the distant rush of the surf on some curving beach; and we return to our constant struggle in the midst of noise with a stronger faith in the divine origin and goal of this strange existence of ours.

"Be still, and know that I am God." There is no sublimer word than that between the two lids of the Bible,—few words so sublime. It is the far-off echo, the precious legacy of an age when men were still. Modern civilization is very swift and noisy; it seldom stops to understand itself or to inquire whence it cometh or whither it goeth. The almost miraculous industrial development of the times (the direct or indirect result of the wonderful progress of modern science) encroaches on men's leisure, and hardly leaves us time to be ourselves. The world, like Saturn, devours its own children. We are almost machines, and are in danger of becoming fixtures in our own railroads, steamboats, factories, foundries. The rush and impetus of the age is tremendous; it makes us giddy, and we cling to the tangible in fear of looking up or down. But we must learn to keep our equipoise, without merging our nobler part, our individual being, in the great whirl of modern society. After all, there is something more important than the prosperity of corporations and firms,—than the accumulation of fortunes and the acquisition of civic honors,—than any of the bright and gaudy baubles that the world holds up so temptingly to our pursuit. We must learn to resist the contagion of the times, and take leisure to be men and women; we must learn to resist the gravitation of the multitudes, and set a profounder value on the formation and development of private character. We must oftener fall back on the primitive solitude of our own souls, seek the stillness of grave and high thought, and forget the wearying distractions of the Many in the unfathomable attractions of the One.

In any season of quiet in our outward surroundings, if we listen very intently for a while, we shall catch a mysterious sound which seems to be a mere singing in our ears,—a very faint, shrill, tiny sound, probably produced by innumerable small vibrations of the atmosphere confusedly reaching the tympanum of the ear from all directions. When lying awake at night, it sometimes becomes all at once audible, and we wonder we have not heard it before. But it is so constant and unvaried that we ordinarily quite fail to notice it: it is always sounding, but we rarely attend to it. Pause at any moment and strive to hear it, and it never eludes our listening. Now I can give this perpetual sound, unnoticed except in hours of still attention, no better name than the voice of silence. It is a teacher of fruitful truths. The voice of silence is to our corporeal hearing what the "still small voice within" is to our spiritual hearing. This always sounds, but, because it is so still and small, we suffer it to be drowned by the clamorous voices of our daily experience. These are very near and urgent, and engross our time and thought. Yet we shall never reach the normal stature of manhood and womanhood, until this voice of silence, this voice of God in the soul, becomes to us the most real and living of all realities. Jesus seems to have always heard it, and hardly to have distinguished it from himself. On the one hand he says—"Verily, verily, I say unto you,"—on the other he says—"I have given unto them the words that thou hast given me." The words of God are always our own words, if they utter themselves in our own hearts; they are the natural expression of our own best and truest selves. Those only have heard the voice of God who have learned to be still,—learned to listen in rapt attention for this inward utterance of the Divine,—learned to silence the din of their own selfishness, and make their lives a perpetual word of God.

It sometimes costs us a great and fearful struggle to be still. There are times when to reduce to quietude the noisy inmates of our hearts becomes that conquest of self which is greater than the conquest of a city. The enticements of temptation are loud-tongued and stubborn, and he who can crush them into silence is a hero. The noise of human wilfulness and selfishness is very hard to quell; but the heart must be freed from all this turmoil before the still, small voice is audible. In the great separations of life, when friends must part to meet no more on this side of the grave, the wild and passionate cry of anguish echoes and re-echoes through the soul; who can hush its piercing note of wailing, and make a stillness for the knowledge of God? The struggles are fearful; they tax the power of human nature to the utmost; yet in these fearful struggles there have been victors, and it is these victors who have been the great beacon-lights of all the ages. Out of the fierce and harsh and angry tumults of the breast they have educed harmony and self-control; the discords have died away in music, and the uproar of the battle has passed into spiritual peace. Every one whose triumphs over himself have made him a friend of man has learned this supreme lesson of stillness before God. It is not the stillness of idleness or inaction, but the stillness of a life that moves without noise or friction to the accomplishment of divine aims. Unobtrusive, unostentatious, yet full of power, such a life revolves about the great thought of duty as the earth sweeps around the sun,—resistless as gravitation, noiseless as the planet in its pathway through the sky.

Miscellaneous.

RATIONALISM IN GERMANY.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

BERLIN, May 28, 1870.

MY DEAR MR. LOWE: You ask me to write you anything likely to be of interest in theological matters. I should take more pleasure in giving you an account of what I have seen and heard in this direction, if things were a little different. You know I have been in Heidelberg, until within a fortnight. I have been studying German with all diligence—not theology; but my intercourse has been largely with theological studies. I have also attended many of the lectures of the theological faculty, and had conversations with some of the professors. My German has not been strong enough to enable me to follow entirely the lectures, but I have got the general drift, I think, and I got much in my conversations.

You have been abroad and know the German ways, of course. How odd it seems in the theological Verein to find the place of assembling in a beer-house, and the intervals between the exercises filled with beer, cigars, and convivial songs! How odd to see a man of the position of Hitzig reading Hebrew in the midst of the smoke and uproar of a noisy Wirthshaus, and be told that regularly, every evening from eight to ten, the old man sits there with his mug and book! But you will not care for these external things.

Of course you know the Heidelberg theology. Schenkel, to whom I brought letters, received me very politely, and has shown me much kindness. He was glad to know I was a Unitarian, and said we were one with his party. You know his positions, of course, from his book. I have heard him often, and so far as I could follow him, a good part of his teaching does not differ much from that given in our own theological schools. He spoke to me of the faculty in Jena as being also Liberal, and of that in Zurich as going beyond his positions. I had much more conversation with a young professor lately from Holland, than with Schenkel. His name is Pierson—a man of excellent ability and scholarship, I thought, and likely to exercise considerable influence on the students, with whom he is very popular. I had a number of conversations with him, and heard several of his lectures, which were clear, strong, and often quite eloquent. He described the Heidelberg professors as going generally beyond Schenkel, certainly Hitzig, and Holtzman, who has the New Testament exegesis. If I understood Pierson right, these men reject the supernatural element in Christ, and so, of course, the miracles. So does Pierson also, and I regret that I did not press him more carefully to describe his own position. He seemed familiar with Channing and Parker, saying that once the latter had interested him much, though now he had come to think slightly of him. He spoke of Channing's influence as being great, particularly in Holland and France, though lately his prestige has been hurt by a depreciatory essay of Renan, whose influence the professor described as great. With regard to the general theological condition of Germany, he described the Orthodox party as having more power than formerly; partly through the great influence of Prussia, whose government is strongly Orthodox, making it even difficult for a Liberal man to get a place in the countries controlled by Prussia. A stronger influence, however, than this, is the fear coming to prevail among religious people before the widely extended skepticism which pervades cultivated German society. It is hardly right to call this materialism. All we know of the world, says the prevalent philosophy, is of forces which act upon the senses. What they come from, whether they inhere in any substances or not, is beyond our ken; and so, too, as to God, the soul, the future life, they are matters beyond our ken. As I understand this philosophy, there is not positive denial, but simply an ignoring of all that belongs to the district of religious faith, as something of which we know nothing through any faculty we possess, and therefore, something to which it is best to be indifferent. How wide-spread this is I need not write you. The Heidelberg professors in general, particular the scientific, who are very distinguished, probably hold to this no-faith, some in an outspoken way; and everywhere in Germany, in the universities and in the most thoughtful classes, my impression is, this style of thinking exists and is spreading. I should like to think it was otherwise, but my impression is, that although the old Orthodoxy loses its hold every day, the tendency is not toward our position, but towards this utter skepticism with regard to the objects of faith. Just now, Orthodoxy, helped by the great power of Prussia, rallies against this tremendous enemy; and, as I understand my well-informed friend to say, and as I conclude from what I see myself, the Liberal position, our position, and that of those who stand upon it, who reject Orthodoxy and yet cling to positive faith, is suffering in the great war.

There are at Heidelberg about sixty theological students, mostly strongly Radical, I thought, and yet studying with rather inconsistent zeal, it seemed to me, the Greek and Hebrew text, going into Arabic, and into the refinements of the New Testament Greek as if they really believed it was all inspired. There was among them a good degree of scholarly rather than religious earnestness.

For instance, I did not attend nor hear of religious meetings among them. Their Verein appeared to exist rather to help them in intellectual and scholarly directions, and sometimes it was a little too convivial to suit entirely the American notion of strict propriety. I am bound to say, however, I found them always most heartily kind, and interested to be helpful in the world. Their conviviality I thought quite innocent.

Probably in writing you thus, I am saying to you nothing new. My impression is, the condition of things on our side of the water is a reflection of the European situation in its essential features. As here, so in America, there exists the vast and increasing body of persons indifferent to religious faith; only among us this body is not dignified as here, by the presence in it of a multitude of serious, hard-working scholars. Against this "indifferentism," the religious world is fighting hard; and many who under different circumstances would stand with us, frightened at the threatening aspect of the enemy, lend their influence to the party with the stricter views.

That it would be pleasant to see the current of dissent from superstitions setting toward us, is a thing of course; and yet that it passes by both wings of Unitarianism, as well the left as the right, in the direction not so much of positive denial as of quiet, cool doubt with regard to immortality, to a God that can be prayed to, perhaps sometimes to human accountability, I fear is the fact. With us in Antioch, for instance, we have no trouble from over-strictness of faith; but the trouble is all from the other way—to awaken any religious interest in the hearts of those who sometimes are our best young people, moral, diligent, desirous to find the truth. It is the influence of Helmholtz, Mill, Comte, etc., filtering down gradually into the ranks of the people, who often are entirely unconscious what the power is that is dissolving the hold of faith upon their souls.

I write you, my dear Mr. Lowe, with great frankness. Of course you desire to have me give my true view. I wish, with all my heart, I could give a more pleasing picture of the prospect; but it seems to me that, in the world of thinking, cultivated men, God is permitting a notable cooling-off of religious faith. How long it will last, who can say? And what is there for Unitarians to do but this—continue to offer our philosophy to the world that turns aside from old superstition, even though the mass choose instead the state of cold, passive, dangerous doubt? It belongs to us to make the offer; and if what we offer is, in a strange degree, as we think, despised and rejected by men, bear it with patience and hope and faith, in the conviction that God is ruler, and will bring his kingdom to pass in His time.

I shall be pleased to hear from you again, and if I can serve you personally in any way, or the Association, I shall be most glad to do so. For the next two months I shall be in Berlin, and a letter addressed to the care of I. Bleichroder & Co. will reach me.

Most truly yours,

JAMES K. HOSMER.

A BLIGHTED LIFE.

To the Editor of the Independent:

Your article in The Independent of the 26th May, entitled "The Agony of a Life Mistake," is the most startling I have ever read in the columns of that paper. Startling both to those who know and to those who do not know the truth of what you allege. There are, no doubt, many clergymen who have read it with eyes full of tears, because it describes their condition, which they thought only God and themselves knew; and, while it offers no help to them in their distress, it tenders a noble sympathy. A convict in prison, conscious of his innocence, is hardly in so pitiable circumstances as a minister who has outgrown his creed, and is yet expected to preach it with as much zeal as ever; and who has come to regard as useless and tasteless, ceremonies which his congregation deem it all important to observe. The following, I think, is the usual history of such cases as you describe. It is the history of one case, I know.

Impelled by the enthusiasm of a revival of religion, a young man leaves the profession of law or medicine, to which he has devoted his life, and enters a theological seminary. There he is pushed through a three-years' course of study—not of theology, which is the science of God, but merely to fit him for the work of saving souls; for the fields are white for the sickle, and the Lord needs laborers to gather the harvest. His constant association all this time is with orthodox men, and his studies are all one-sided. The library of the seminary has volumes on polemic theology, but not one of the original works of the heretics whose opinions they profess to refute. His mind is in a state of perfect receptivity. As a nest of young robins open their mouths wide and take down without scruple whatever their parents bring them, whether an angle-worm or caterpillar, so a class of theological students, with unbounded confidence in their professors, receive from them and their textbooks anything that is labelled "orthodox"; for the only becoming word on their lips is Credo, and the attribute of infallibility is not ascribed exclusively to the Pope of Rome.

After leaving the cloister of the seminary, where only one kind of atmosphere circulates, and that of the warmest and murkiest kind, the young man is ordained and settled as a minister of the Gospel. Now he begins, for the first time in his religious life, to mix with the world, and to meet the chilling breezes from the Northeast and the Northwest, as well as the soft zephyrs of the seminary. He becomes personally acquainted with "heretics" and "infidels"; and instead of seeing horns and hoofs on them, as he expected to be the case from the representations of his instructors, finds them to be intelligent and religious men. Profiting by this experience, he begins to read, as well as to see, on the other side of the question. After awhile, suspecting that he has been hoodwinked, he gets works of criticism, and after a year's secret reading while other people are sleeping becomes convinced that his theology, like a bottomless tub, will not hold water. The more he examines, the more he loses confidence in the creed and corresponding customs of the church.

Now, what is he to do? Respect his convictions; announce to his people his change of opinion; get the heresy-hunters, with their keen scent, like sleuth-hounds, on his track; lose caste with the brethren, and become as a heathen man and a publican to all his evangelical friends, (and he has none other)? He has a wife and five children dependent for bread on his pittance of a salary; and these constitute six weighty reasons why he should suppress what he now believes to be the truth, and go on in the old way. He don't dare to reveal the secret of his unbelief to the wife of his bosom; for she might not sympathize with him, and would cry herself to death. Urged on, however, by his love of truth, he pursues his inquiries; for, Mr. Editor, a man who has brains enough to be a Congregational or Presbyterian preacher, when he once gets upon the track of investigation, cannot switch off at will, but must go on to the terminus of the road. Before he gets half way, however, the creed and the ceremonies become first a straight-jacket, and then, alas! as the shirt of Nessus. Oh, the humiliation of being forced by circumstances to preach what one don't believe, and to practice forms which an enlightened judgment pronounces, for him, to be mere mummery! No South Carolina slave ever groaned under such a bondage.

But I am asked, "What would you have?" Why, I would have theological professors tell the student at the start that the truth of nominal Christianity has been questioned by some of the ablest and most honest minds in the world, and that it must not be taken for granted. I would have them, as brave lovers of truth, instead of skulking cowards, put such books into his hand as Curtis's "Human Element in Divine Inspiration," Newman's "Phases of Faith," Gregg's "Creed of Christendom," "Essays and Reviews," Parker's and Renan's works, urging a severe and impartial examination of them, saying that, if the creed of the church cannot be defended against just criticism, so much the worse for the creed, and so much the better for the student; for it is not too late then to be saved from "the agony of a life mistake," and to enter upon another calling.

Instead of this, however, the student pursues his courses of "training," is thrust into the pulpit blindfolded, the ordination vows are imposed on him, and he is committed to preach, and does preach for twenty years, perhaps, a set of doctrines he has never examined, and therefore has never believed. For no man has a right to say he believes a system of opinions, unless he examines them in the light of opposing propositions and is convinced of their truth.

Do you suppose that, if a young man of ability had had at the seminary the least chance in the world to know his right hand from his left in these matters, he would furnish you the material for writing such an editorial as you have? I knew of a case where a single reading of Brown's lecture on Cause and Effect was enough to alarm a theological student at an orthodox seminary, and drive him back to the bar, where he saved his conscience and self-respect and achieved both fortune and distinction.

Mr. Editor, I belong to the class of men you have described; and the object of this communication is to express in the columns of a paper where they see it, my indignation at the policy which my theological professors pursued toward me at a time when my confidence in their ability and honesty was unbounded, and when I was as plastic under their influence as clay in the hands of the potter. I feel, to the very centre of my being, that they have inflicted upon my soul the deepest and most remediless injury that one man can inflict upon another in this world. They have blighted and blasted my life; and, whether they know better or not, my loss is so great that I am not Christian enough in my spirit to forgive them. They have created in my bosom a feeling of bitterness toward them and their systems which, although not publicly and personally expressed, is as deep as the sea, and which only he can understand and excuse who also has had the best years of his life squandered, and who carries with him the humiliating conviction that he has been made a fool of by his teachers, to subserve mere ecclesiastical purposes.

As I have been a reader of The Independent from the beginning, and never before asked a favor, I hope you will gratify my feelings by publishing this communication.

THE POPE AS A THAUMATURGIST.

[From the Protestant Churchman.]

If we are to believe recent accounts from the continent, we must believe in the infallible power of the Pope to work miracles, as well as to teach the truth, and propound dogmas of unerring certainty. We learn from the Gartenlaube, "that soon after Easter an event occurred in Rome which throws an interesting light on the state of things in the Eternal City, and on the views of the Pope regarding his own person and office. The scene is at Monte Mario, in the neighborhood of Villa Melini. Leaning heavily on the arm of an attendant, the Pope climbed the steep ascent, the impersonation of corporal weakness and decrepitude. Among a troop of mendicants there was one lame of both feet, who seemed to have a particular claim on the compassion of the benevolent. As his Holiness drew near, the withered countenance of the beggar brightened up; he raised his hands, and every feature seemed to say: "Master, have pity on me!" Pope Pius went up to him, and when we recollect his very decided penchant for miracles, and his firm conviction that he himself is a wonderful instrument of Divine Providence, we can easily comprehend the sequel.

Profoundly agitated, he raised his hand, and said to the infirm mendicant, 'Arise, take up thy bed and walk!' It is hardly possible to form an idea of the effect produced on the poor sufferer by these words issuing from the mouth of infallibility. He stood a moment as if electrified, and then, with sparkling eyes, sprang up, and advanced two or three paces. The countenance of the Pope beamed with rapture, but in a few seconds the seemingly healed beggar fell heavily to the ground. Like a soldier pressing forward with desperate energy to the attack of an impregnable fortress, the Pontiff cried a second time, 'Arise, and walk!' but when the patient sprang up again only to fall down anew, the hands of the Pope trembled, his voice became hoarse, and he repeated the command a third time stammering. Yet another convulsive effort, and the eyes of the half-savage and filthy Lazarus revealed all his sufferings and his disappointment. The face of Pope Pius became deadly pale, and he was borne, half-fainting, to his carriage. In another moment the vehicle was rolling away at a furious pace, while the unfortunate mendicant lay writhing on the street and groaning."

A JUST REBUKE.

[From the Toledo Blade.]

On Monday last a novel foot race occurred at Cleveland. The contestants were two women, who ran for a purse of $50. Nothing was wanting, which is generally attendant upon events of this kind. The gambling fraternity speculated upon the points of the contestants, as they would upon horses, "betting two to one on the little woman." Of such is the woman's rights movement.—Toledo Commercial.

The "woman's rights movement," whatever may be its merits or demerits, is entitled to decent treatment, and to be met by reason and argument, and not by contemptible flings like the one above quoted. There are many estimable ladies who believe that they ought to be at liberty to accompany their husbands, brothers or sons to the ballot, there to vote as their views of duty to their country may prompt. What logical connection our cotemporary can see between that opinion and a foot race between two women with the accessories of betting, and other objectionable things, we can not imagine. The "woman's rights movement" has no legitimate tendency toward exhibitions of this sort, and it is a slander to say "of such is the woman's rights movement." It is a cowardly way of dealing with any cause to load it with undeserved reproaches.

If ladies degrade their womanhood by engaging in athletic contests, do not men dishonor their manhood by doing the same thing? If it be shameful for women to furnish occasion for betting, or other forms of gambling, by such exhibitions, is it any less shameful in the stronger sex, who, by virtue of their superior strength, ought to set them the best possible examples? We shall be glad if such exhibitions shall give men to see their own vices in a more vivid light. So far as we can see, that which looks morally repulsive when done by a woman, can not be very justifiable when done by one of the male sex. We shall be glad when it shall look as bad in the eyes of both men and women for a man to disgrace himself as it does for a woman. But we fail to see that the "woman's rights movement" has any tendency whatever in the direction of leading the sex into questionable courses. We therefore insist on fair, courteous and decorous allusions only to a cause which commands the approval and sympathy of many of the purest and most refined women of our land.

TARRED AND FEATHERED.

[The Seaside Oracle, of Wiscasset, Me., which, although very small, is one of the very best of our exchanges, reprints the following pungent rebuke of an outburst of religious spleen which has already been published in The INDEX, No. 32, in the "Department of the Free Religion Association."—ED.]

The Hon. Lewis Barker, of Stetson, writes this indignant letter to the Gospel Banner:

STETSON, July 14, 1870.

MY DEAR MR. QUINBY:—I am pained beyond expression to find you copying from the "Covenant" (I don't know what nor where nor by whom published), a dirty little fling at "Free Religion" and its believers. It was in your last week's issue, under the heading of "Other Churches."

The spirit of the thing was in harmony with nothing I ever saw from your pen, or heard from your lips. It was the self-complacent grunt of a full-fed boar as he rolls over in his church sty. "It don't pay!" Is that your test? "Higginson was starved out—Wasson driven to the Custom House—and Parker had to eat his own bread!" and therefore, Free Religion is "without root" and a failure! In that coarse sense, did your own Murray run a paying business, when he smashed the crockery of the old theologies? Was Christ's mission a paying one? Who among the image-breakers has made money out of his iconoclasm?

"Is the dollar only real?"

Are God and truth and right a dream?" and is that man's mission a failure who fails merely to secure bread and breeches for his labors in behalf of his race?

The loathsome moral leper who wrote that article deserves to be booied by every man in the land.

Yours in disgust,

LEW. BARKER.

RELIGIOUS OPINIONS OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

[From "Frederick the Great," in Harper's Magazine for June.]

It is perhaps not strange that Frederick should have imbibed a strong feeling of antipathy to Christianity. In his father's life he had witnessed only its most repulsive caricature. While making the loudest protestations of piety, Frederick William, in his daily conduct, had manifested mainly only every thing that is hateful and of bad report. Still, it is quite evident that Frederick was not blind to the distinction between the principles of Christianity, as taught by Jesus and developed in His life, and the conduct of those who, professing His name, trampled those principles beneath their feet. In one of his letters to Voltaire, dated Cirey, Aug. 26, 1736, Frederick wrote: "May you never be disgusted with the sciences by the quarrels of their cultivators; a race of men no better than courtiers; often enough as greedy, intriguing, false and cruel as these."

And how sad for mankind that the very interpreters of Heaven's commandment—the theologians I mean—are sometimes the most dangerous of all professed messengers of the Divinity, yet men sometimes of obscure ideas and pernicious behavior, their souls blown out with mere darkness, full of gall and pride in proportion as it is empty of truths. Every thinking being who is not of their opinion is an atheist; and every king who does not favor them will be damned. Dangerous to the very throne, and yet intrinsically insignificant.

I respect metaphysical ideas. Rays of lightning they are in the midst of deep night. More, I think, is not to be hoped from metaphysics. It does not seem likely that the first principles of things will ever be known. The mice that nestle in some little holes of an immense building know not whether it is eternal, or who the architect, or why he built it. Such mice are we. And the Divine Architect has never, that I know of, told His secret to one of us."

Talking of the Church, there has been a curious controversy in Dublin between the National Board of Education and Cardinal Cullen touching the morality taught to children in the school text-books. For instance, the Cardinal denies that it is right to teach children that concealing the truth to avoid unpleasant consequences is lying, or that "we are commanded by God to speak every man truth unto his neighbor." But to the following statement, which is made to children in school, he specially objects: "We may say things which are not entirely false, but may bear a double meaning, or are true in themselves, but not true in the sense in which our hearers understand us, in which case we lead people to believe what is false. This is called equivocation, and is to all intents and purposes the same as a lie, and equally criminal." "This teaching is," he says, "not correct, and such doctrines ought not to be infused into the minds of children."—N. Y. Nation.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I intended to enclose five dollars to have the Radical and THE INDEX for a year; but I am sorry to learn I cannot. If I do not send much money at a time, yet count me a subscriber to THE INDEX for life—its life or mine, or both—so long as it stands for freedom and fidelity to truth, at all events. If I can not agree with you fully, I certainly do mainly, and stand pledged to welcome and defend all of your truth that I can make my own. Certain from the first that the American people would respect the fearless utterance of a sincere soul, however unpopular it might be with the creed-bound, I have not been disappointed at your success, and feel sure of its continuance. I welcome your boldest word, and am sure that truth will triumph the sooner for it, be you correct or in error. The timid, who wrap up their convictions, and tremble at the revelations of their reason, are the ones to be dreaded, for they delay truth's triumph, although they cannot prevent it. God speed you in your efforts to proclaim the Absolute Religion. I hope to be able to send you more subscribers. If you can spare me a few odd numbers of THE INDEX, I will put them where they may help on the work."

—"This is the anniversary of our independence, reminding us of our spiritual birthright as well as temporal. Your course seems to me justifiable, the only reasonable one, on the question of authority. Believing in the common idea that all men are born free and equal, the miraculous-born finds no place in the understanding, cannot come into our sphere of thought, because it is outside of anything we know. If we accept it, confusion of ideas is the result. A 'thus saith the Lord,' may be authority to the one addressed, but not to another. A Mormon elder said to me some twenty five years ago, 'The Lord has sent me to bring you out of Babylon.' 'Very good,' said I; 'but I have seen the Lord since you have, and he told me to look out for you and see whether you were true or false!' If we admit this assumption to impose on us, there is no end to it. Brigham Young is as good as any, if we are to lay aside reason."

—"I have taken your paper from the beginning, and I do not think I can possibly do without it now. I wish I could send you the names of some new subscribers, but the people of this place are too much bound up in the creeds of their fathers even to tolerate a liberal journal. I am a native of Massachusetts, but I have spent most of my time for the past five years in this place, being sent here by the — as a teacher. We have a large school here, of which Miss —, of —, is the Principal. We are debarred from all intelligent society here on account of our occupation and principles; but with my school and the free thoughts of great minds, which come here in such papers as THE INDEX, I scarcely feel it to be a loss."

—"Becoming imbued with radical thought, given in its bravest, tenderest manner by that young apostle, I long to put in simple words of my own its beautiful, helpful teachings. Will you further this wish? Each tender expression of the new faith is better than many expositions of it, is it not? A late comer to the 'New Faith,' I am more enthusiastic than old Unitarians; and may be what seems very beautiful and comforting to me, is but an 'old story' to most of you. However, I am in hopes to do my little bit of work in the right direction. I am delighted with the success of THE INDEX, and find it for myself full of meat. Hoping it may grow into all you desire it to be, I remain, &c."

DOUBLE STARS.

Two burning souls, earth's rarest bliss to prove,
 The height and depth of human love explore;
 Yet still unwed and isolate they move,
 And, having all, unsated pine for more.
 Though eye court eye, and arm with arm inweave,
 And soul to soul flame forth the inward fire,
 From Fate's decree yet win they no reprieve,— Fools of unfed and infinite desire.
 Thus in yon star-lit dome twin-mated spheres, Drawn by sweet influence strange, yearn each for each,
 And each round each revolve through endless years,
 Yet the longed union seek in vain to reach:
 Sundered yet linked, their lonely course they run,
 Two stars forever that would fain be one.

FREEDOM OR FATE?

A few weeks ago we published a striking article entitled "A Plea for Necessity," to which we promised a reply. It criticised a previous editorial of our own with great subtilty and analytic skill. We regret that the highly metaphysical character of the subject prevents a thorough discussion of our correspondent's arguments point by point. Such a discussion would require more space in our columns than we deem it wise to devote to questions of pure metaphysics. It is the general aspect of this great problem which we mean to touch upon to-day, and we shall pass over the special criticisms made, being more concerned to vindicate the reality of spiritual freedom than merely to defend what we have written. It is enough to say that we still think the points we made to be well taken.

In his Cogitata Metaphysica (I, 3, 10), Spinoza says that "we clearly and distinctly perceive, if we attend to our own nature, that we are free in our actions;" but that, "if we attend to the nature of God, we clearly and distinctly perceive that all things depend upon him, and that nothing exists except what has been decreed to exist by God from all eternity." This statement of the father of modern radicalism, fairly interpreted, is true; for by the decrees of God must be understood in modern phrase the immutable laws of Nature. If we consider the moral nature of man, we see that man is free, morality being impossible without freedom. This "L. T. I." in fact admits, when he says:—"I see no virtue save love of right, no vice save love of wrong, and no merit and demerit in either; but great good fortune in the one and great bad fortune in the other." Virtue, if reduced to "great good fortune," is annihilated in any real, distinctive sense. If, on the other hand, we consider only the omnipresent and single Force of the Universe, we seem to see that all human actions are effects of one eternal cause, and that freedom must be a pure illusion.

This is the hypothesis, and the sole hypothesis, which can justify the doctrine of Necessity or the conclusions of "L. T. I."

In other words, there are but two positions which are logically tenable on this subject:—

1. The law of causation is absolutely universal, and applies as rigorously to human actions as to physical phenomena. No man could by any possibility act otherwise than exactly as he does act, every action being the necessary result of pre-existent causes. This is pure Fatalism,—the unconditional denial of all human freedom.

2. The moral nature of man is a universal fact of human knowledge. The power of free choice is the ground of all moral approbation or disapprobation. So far as capable of free choice, man is not under the law of causation, but is himself a free cause. This is the doctrine of Freedom,—the affirmation of man's moral nature.

We admit the requirements of logic,—we must deny the applicability of the law of causation to moral actions. In fact, it has surprised us that "L. T. I." has not pressed this point, which would have been his strongest weapon. But to claim that man cannot be free because the law of causation is universal, would simply be to beg the question. The question at issue is really this,—is man in all his actions under the law of absolute causation?

Yes? Then man is neither free nor a moral being.

No? Then he is both.

Fatalism or Freedom—these are the only alternatives. All attempts to discover a mean between them are futile. If human actions are always absolutely caused, Fatalism is true in its most absolute sense. If they are not thus caused, Freedom is true to the extent we claim for it. That is, man has a power of free choice limited by his organization and his circumstances; with his organization and under his circumstances, he is always free to make for himself a higher or lower moral character.

Now we claim that Fatalism, to which the doctrine of Necessity is logically pushed, has no basis but a speculative theory of causation,—the a priori assumption that the law of absolute causation must cover all moral as well as all physical phenomena. And we also claim that the doctrine of Freedom rests on the fact of man's moral nature, and cannot be denied without denying man's moral nature. This "L. T. I." has denied, in reducing virtue to "great good fortune." There is no virtue in fortune, good or bad. Our assertion is thus made good that his doctrine rests only on speculation, while ours rests on facts.

Fatalism reduces the sense of shame to an inexplicable anomaly. It teaches that we cannot help doing whatever we do; and why feel ashamed of what we cannot help? Shame, on the one hand, and self-respect, on the other, are absurd on this theory. But on the theory of Freedom they are great incentives to virtue, and hold a large place in every ethical system. "A man may not be without shame," says Mencius, the great Chinese moralist; "when one is ashamed of having been without shame, he will afterwards not have occasion for shame." This is the testimony of all who have profoundly studied the moral nature of man,—the great indestructible fact on which rests our faith in spiritual freedom.

Freedom! Why, this is the inspiration of the nineteenth century, the very breath of life of our American civilization. Free government, free thought, free development, free religion,—are these words meaningless? Yes, if the doctrine of Necessity be true. It takes the philosophy of spiritual freedom to explain the life of America and the modern world. No philosophy will hereafter find acceptance which begins by denying it. Turkish fatalism and Genevan Calvinism may deny it; but their day is passing away, and humanity with one voice affirms it as the eternal corner-stone of the future.

Who can help rejoicing in the success of the German cause, even while deploring the bloodshed and anguish that it costs? With the people, whether German or French, we deeply sympathize; and may the day soon come when ambitious tyrants shall lose their power of plunging nations that ought to be friends into the horrors of mutual hate and murder! It would be cause of exultation for all mankind, if the present earthquake should topple into eternal ruin every throne in Europe, whether imperial or royal, and clear the ground for a new brotherhood of the nations. For such a triumph of humanity, would even the sickening slaughter of battle be too terrible a price to pay? There are thousands of noble men who would willingly be the victims of such a holocaust.

Rev. Mr. Fulton does not believe in damnation for all sinners in general but for no one sinner in particular. He is for applying the general rule to special cases, and therefore sends Charles Dickens where evangelical doctrines certainly send him. He has good reason to be disgusted with the wily brethren who will not, in the case of a popular man, commit themselves to the particular application of the "Divine decrees." They are certainly like the man (was it Doesticks?) who "was in favor of the Maine Liquor Law, but opposed to its execution."

The evangelical exultation over the supposed demise of the Radical was premature, as appears below. Perhaps it would be in accordance with orthodoxy, however, that the Radical should "rise from the dead."

The publication of The Radical will be resumed at the commencement of the new year. Subscriptions should be sent in early in the fall. During his vacation the editor hopes to perfect measures for increasing the merits of the magazine by the addition of appropriate Scientific and Literary Departments, and of careful selections and translations from foreign writers. The free and thoughtful character of The Radical will be maintained. Copies of Vol. I. will be ready for sale early in the fall. Orders should be promptly sent, as the number for sale is limited to one hundred copies. Price, $5.00 per volume. Address The Radical, 25 Bromfield St., Boston.

We are indebted to Mr. Warren Chase, western editor of the Banner of Light, for repeated kindly and cordial notices in that paper. Mr. Chase belongs to that large class of spiritualists who, while firmly believing in the fact of "spirit intercourse," refuse to make it a dogma, and disapprove all attempts to build up a close religious fellowship on it as a basis. Among spiritualists of this liberal character, Free Religion has many of its most earnest friends; and we cordially reciprocate the good will which they so frequently express towards our attempts to promote universal and lasting brotherhood on the ground of reverence for our common humanity.

We are glad to learn that the Wocheentliche Express, the excellent German weekly of Toledo, will soon be issued as a daily. It deserves the most liberal support from the public.

A SUGGESTION.

FAIRMOUNT AVENUE, }
HYDE PARK, MASS., August 6, 1870. }

Dear Brother Abbot,—Herewith you may find my name and address for a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year.

Your paper is so good,—the matter it contains and the questions it raises are so important, and so fairly, ably, and honestly discussed,—that I hope you will have a somewhat minute and thorough Table of Contents, an Index to THE INDEX. The volume must be of standard value for a long time to come among religious thinkers, and a pretty full Index to it will enhance its value.

Yours in the unity of a nobler than Christian faith,

A. E. GILES.

P. S. Friend Wasson has a very acute, and in some respects a very peculiar mind. In discussing your definition of religion in the Radical, he seems to me to have gone off at a tangent, taking and grinding very fine a subsidiary matter, very much like the man who wanted to find out the essence of flour, and accordingly took a grain of wheat, selected the husk, triturated that, and then exhibited the dust of the husk as the essence of flour!

My definition of religion is, "the unity of self with God," in other words, "one's consciousness of God." In still other words, "the unity of an external consciousness with our most interior and potential being."

A. E. G.

[It is part of our plan to carry into effect the excellent suggestion of our correspondent as to an index to the volume. It will be made as complete may be.—Ed.]

A PEACE MEMORIAL.

PHILADELPHIA, 8th Mo. 5, 1870.

ED. "THE INDEX":

Esteemed Friend,—I like the August 6 number, and I like especially the articles—"Weighed in the Balance," and "The persecution of the colored cadet at West Point." And why? Because I took the trouble to draft and forward the following memorial. The Peace Society got hundreds of names, and mark the result.

We have now an additional reason for abolishing West Point Military Academy.

Respectfully,

ALFRED H. LOVE.

"Quite a number of the following memorials on West Point Military Academy have been sent from time to time to Congress, some of them very numerous signed, and they have been promptly presented by Hon. Charles Sumner to the Senate, and Hon. Leonard Myers to the House of Representatives. They were regularly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and its chairman, Hon. Henry Wilson, recently reported that they had received attention and (not unexpectedly to us) were recommended to be indefinitely postponed, which on vote was done.

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED:

Your Memorialists, members of the Universal Peace Union, and Friends of Peace of America, regarding with serious apprehension the Military System, and encouraged by the efforts in Europe for a General Disarmament and Settlement of difficulties by Arbitration, respectfully and earnestly petition your Honorable Body not to sanction the proposed Enlargement of West Point Military Academy, which, apart from all other considerations, has not been productive of loyalty, security, or economy. Many of the Generals in the recent rebellion were its graduates, and the amount already spent since its establishment is $8,532,393, which amount, had it been devoted to giving the poor of our country a Common School Education, would have greatly increased loyalty, security, and economy."

THE NEW MOVEMENT AT SYRACUSE.

THE RADICAL CLUB.—The Radical Club will meet at their Club Room, No. 20 Clinton Block, to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock. An address by F. E. Abbot, on "The Bible in the Public Schools," will be read, after which there will be a free discussion of that question.—Syracuse Daily Standard, Aug. 6.

SYRACUSE, Aug. 8, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—Our effort to establish a Radical Club and free reading room, to be open on all days of the week, succeeds finely. We have rented a pleasant room that will accommodate from fifty to seventy-five persons, and for the last four weeks have held Thursday evening meetings that have been well attended. We have desired to hold Sunday afternoon meetings at our Club room for the purpose of discussing radical questions.

The first of these meetings was held yesterday, and the subject of discussion was the Bible in schools. The meeting was opened by the reading of the address entitled "The Bible in the Public Schools," published in number thirty-one of THE INDEX. The discussion was very earnest and was participated in by some eight or ten of the members, two or three taking the ground that the reading of the Bible without note or comment was beneficial. Those who opposed its reading presented a variety of reasons for their opposition, and all agreed that it was a question of justice. Rev. Mr. Mundy (Independent Minister) stated that he individually was in favor of reading from the Bible and from other books of a moral and religious nature; but if any one individual objected, justice would require that such books be excluded.

Two Methodist ministers were present Sunday afternoon, but declined to take part in the discussion. One of them, Rev. Mr. Crook, is the editor of a Methodist paper published in this city, and a man of very decided abilities.

During the discussion, a very able article, written by James G. Clark, of this city, which appeared in last week's Independent on "State Religion and the Bible as a School Book," was read.

Mr. Clark is a young man of fine intellectual abilities, and is known throughout this and many other States as a distinguished concert singer, composing his own pieces. If your space would permit, I should be pleased to see this article copied in THE INDEX. At least, friend Abbot, I hope you will call the attention of your readers to the article. Mr. Clark is an earnest friend of THE INDEX.

Pardon this long letter, and allow me to thank you in the name of the Club for your liberal contribution of INDEXES.

Yours truly,

H. L. GREEN.

[The article of Mr. Clark deserves all the praise bestowed, and more. Although too long to be copied entire, we had cut from it the following passage for THE INDEX, as worthy of very sober reflection.

"Roman Catholicism usually carries its points by strategy, and seldom by direct assault. I believe that future events will prove that the Bible question was opened at this early day for the sole purpose of committing Protestants to a principle which Romanists do not yet dare advocate.

If the precedent of nationalizing Christianity be once established, we may look for a most rigid application of the principle when Rome holds the balance of political power, and numbers six churches and convents where she now does one.

Disguise the fact as we may, the difference between the creed of the Catholic and that of the Protestant is simply incidental, and not fundamental. And those men who approve of acknowledging the deity of Jesus in the Constitution, and who, like Dr. Cheever, favor a state religion, are blindly acting as skirmishers for the Pope of Rome, and unconsciously forging weapons which will yet be used in warfare against the true spirit of Protestantism."

The great advantage of forming Radical Clubs consists in their adaptation for efficient agitation of needed reforms in the direction of spiritual freedom. We are much gratified to see the Radical Club of Syracuse taking such earnest hold of one of these reforms. It will be all the better if they follow it up by starting a petition similar to that just adopted in Toledo. Local agitation alone will produce local enlightenment; and it is quite time for liberals to throw off their short-sighted indifferentism, come down from the clouds, and put their shoulders to the wheel of practical work.—Ed.]

AN OPEN LETTER TO ROBERT COLLYER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., August, 1870.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER, Pastor of Unity Church, Chicago:

Dear Sir and Brother,—Having observed your career and read your sermons and essays with much interest for several years past, I have become convinced that with perhaps one exception (and I do not refer to Beecher) you are exerting more influence over the religious thought of this country than any other man. In view of this fact, I am sure you will agree with me that it is of the utmost importance that from your pulpit and pen you give only live thought and sound counsel, such as shall quicken the best emotions and strengthen the best energies of humanity. It is no less important, you will admit, that your position before the world be an unequivocal one, sustaining the right and condemning the wrong by action as well as by words. I do not question your honesty and entire devotion to what you conceive to be the best interests of humanity. I cannot, however, avoid the conclusion (and in this I am corroborated by many of your most ardent admirers) that much of your influence for good is neutralized by your tacit acceptance of the Bible as a book of authority above other books, and still more by your sectarian connections. I assume that you have by exercise of free thought come to regard the story of the fall of man, as recorded in the Bible, as a mythical legend; and the whole system of redemption based upon it is to you only interesting as a superstition of the past. Further, I assume that you believe that all claims of Jesus to a special Messiahship, whether made by himself or by his friends in his behalf, arose from the fact that he and they accepted without question the superstitions of their age and race; that Jesus, therefore, although a good man and great religious teacher, is still only a man whose words are to be accepted at their real value alone; and that to be influenced by reverence for his person or respect for his imaginary office is to be unjust to ourselves and to do violence to truth. I deem myself justified in the above assumptions by your sermons, lectures and writings. If I have misapprehended you, I shall be glad to be corrected.

I also understand you to believe in personal responsibility; that each one must save himself by developing the higher and holding in subjection the lower faculties of his being; that all the aid we can render each other must come through precept, example, or sympathy; and that to the extent that they taught the truth and exemplified the same in their lives, and showed themselves in sympathy with the great heart of humanity (and no further), are Jesus, Confucius, Socrates, and other great reformers, helpers and saviors of their fellows.

If I have correctly interpreted your views, on what grounds can you justly claim to be a Christian? Do you not by such claim subject yourself to the necessity of continually explaining your views, and still find it impossible to get the people to understand you?

A Christian is a believer in the Christ. I do not understand you to be a believer in the Messiahship or Christly office of Jesus; therefore I cannot regard you as a Christian. A disciple of Jesus you may be, so far as you accept him as a teacher and example; but this does not entitle you to the appellation of Christian, if we are to accept authority in definitions. In this country, the authoritative definition of the word Christian is one who accepts Jesus of Nazareth as the only "Son of God," and relies upon his vicarious sufferings and mediatorial offices for salvation from sin or its consequences. If you do not accept this creed, do you not do yourself an injustice by permitting the title of Christian to cling to you? And do you not, in calling yourself a Christian, practically endorse dogmas which you hold to be odious and injurious? If a stranger should ask your political views, and you should reply,—"I am a democrat,"—would you not be under the necessity of entering into a long explanation of your definition of the word democrat to save yourself from the injurious inferences he would be sure to draw from it? Now I am sure that, although your Christianity may be justly questioned, your democracy cannot. Yet you call yourself a Christian in religion, but take no special pains to advertise yourself a democrat in politics.

Again, while claiming to be a disciple of Jesus, whose chief effort was directed against sectarianism and in favor of a universal brotherhood, you cling to a sect, and give the weight of your great influence in its favor. True, you have left the narrower for the broader sect, and in this you have acted wisely. But do you not see that all creeds and organizations based upon them foster antagonisms and divide the people, and render impossible the state of society for which Jesus hoped, prayed, and died? Had Jesus attached himself to one of the sects of his time and country, he would have been promoted to a position of honor and profit; and, instead of holding forth to the rabble in the village street and mountain pass, he could have dispensed the gospel to the aristocracy in a fashionable synagogue. His success would have been more apparent to his contemporaries, had he pursued this course. But do you believe it would have been so real? On the contrary, do you not think such a policy would have been fatal to him as a great reformer, no matter how radical his preaching, how pure his life?

In conclusion allow me to assure you that my sole object in addressing you this letter is to promote truth and human welfare.

Believing you devoted to these, I shall expect a candid reply through THE INDEX at your earliest convenience. In the meantime I am Very respectfully and fraternally yours,

T. A. BLAND.

NEARER TO TRUTH;

A WORD TO L. T. I. ON NECESSITY.

It is not a question of Freedom or Necessity, but Freedom and Necessity. I was made with a white skin, blue eyes, brown hair, a male. Over these I had no control before birth. My father and mother, before I was conscious, might have tried to control in a measure my "make-up," physically and mentally. If I was born to health and sense, I may thank them for it. At my birth, air rushed into my lungs. This I could not prevent, though the doctor or my mother might have put a qui-tus to the little lump of flesh, and prevented this article for THE INDEX. I was born on American soil, and educated in the Christian religion.

Over the above conditions I had no control. What I am, the above and other numerous conditions indicate. My loves, desires, feelings, are produced within me; they are a part of me. I am the percipient of external facts. I am moved by oxygen gas, the foe to my organism, which continually tears it down, wasting and destroying it. How moved in this way? By hunger and pain, through a law of Demand and Supply. Waste in the body moves the animal to supply the waste. Waste creates every love, desire, feeling, action of the animal. This is necessity. The forces which cause man to act are as blind as the steam which pushes the piston rod in our engine, and the law of their action is as irrevocable.

But—"How shall I act?" This question could never have been asked by the steam in the boiler of an engine, nor by oxygen gas in the lungs. Yet it has been asked a million times by the animal. It also could never have been asked without the conception of choice. This is a great moral question. It lies in fact at the base of all morals. The How comprehends the Ought. The Ought is dimly visible to the scientific moralist. The How enters into every action.

There is diversity in Nature. No two things are alike; no two aims, no two incentives to choice, are alike. Among many unlikes, which will you take? You cannot possess all. Which road will you travel? You cannot travel all at the same time. Necessitated as we are to choose, yet Reason dictates the choice. If the choice results in good, it is moral action; if not, immoral. When a person acts without choice, no question of morals can arise, any more than in the action of any other blind force.

Do you ask—"What is good?" I answer, when I benefit myself and do not injure any other person. This is the test of virtue and merit. The greatest satisfaction of my life is, that I merit the approbation of the good men and women with whom I am associated. This merit, felt within, is the mainspring of all noble endeavor. I cannot degrade myself into that half-intellectual, sickly modesty which says—"I am nothing," "I merit nothing." This is born of the old theology. I am something! And I am determined to be more. I do merit something, and I am determined to merit more. This is the language of great and meritorious character.

The truth is, Nature is an infinite paradox; and to the superficial eye is a bundle of contradictions. This arises from the duality of the universe,—Matter and Force. Matter is infinitely divisible. Force is infinitely unitary. It is the function of Force to move matter, and in this we have all the phenomena of the universe. The grand fact of Nature is, DIVERSITY IN UNITY.

In the organic world one great law governs; it is the law of DEMAND AND SUPPLY. We rise one step higher in conscious existence and say—FREEDOM IN NECESSITY. Necessity or Freedom, is but half of the fact; as well try to make a scientific explanation of Nature by affirming Force to be the cause of all things and denying the existence of matter, or affirming matter and denying Force.

We are both free and necessitated. We are compelled to act. We may choose the method of action; plan our actions, control and guide them. Breathing is a necessity of life; yet I can refrain from breathing fifty seconds. I can begin to hold my breath at a given second, determined beforehand. Yet the limit is absolute beyond which I cannot go. It is false to talk of "free will." It is necessitated will and free choice.

HUMAN FREEDOM.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Aug. 5, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—The reading of the very able and interesting discussion of Free Will, and the various remarks touching creation of or by natural law, have begotten in my mind an ardent desire to say a word upon both topics. The diversified faculties of the human mind are so related to each other as to secure the proper discharge of all its functions without the loss of its freedom, unless this is necessarily destroyed by their relations. If their relationships destroy their freedom, then nothing can be free, as all things are related. The mind is a beautiful epitome of a well organized government, consisting of the co-ordinate legislative, judicial, and executive departments, and gives the race the best type of such a government. But I do not regard the human will as an arbitrary power, planted by the Divine hand deep down in the human mind, there to rule with despotic sway; but rather as a subordinate force, giving efficiency to the intelligent faculties, which subjectively investigate motives presented both by objective realities and their own suggestions, and use the will as a blind instrumentality, like that of steam or police, to carry out their own ends. The subtle difficulties in the way of a clear conception of this abstruse question seem to be the faulty definitions of Will and Freedom. But the view above imperfectly expressed, makes it comparatively easy to analyze the mind, and discern the function and relations of the human will. I see a wide difference between the necessary fall of a raised weight and the rejection of the wine that sparkles in the eye of Alimentiveness. Both are related, but the latter only is free. Relation is unavoidably involved in any true idea of freedom.

In regard to creation, I deem it the Omnipotent activity of Omniscience, and have no doubt it would be eminently just and proper, in transferring all of the attributes of the Deity to Law, to let his name go with them.

Fraternally thine,

INFORMATION WANTED.

DELAVER, WIS., July 25, 1870.

ED. INDEX:—Can some of your readers give me any reliable information about the problem of immortality? Out here in Wisconsin we are anxious to know more about it. If we were satisfied that there is no individual remembrance beyond death, we would try and become reconciled to annihilation; for it cannot be a very bad place. Squire Church has said that we should have plenty of books to read there (i. e. the books and writings that have gone to oblivion before us). And yet I cannot quite relinquish immortal hope, while Spiritualists have such seeming success in demonstrating it. I give them this credit, because I am not aware of any other society that makes the least effort to solve this matter. Like the Irishman, "I love solitude most when I have some one to tell it to." Prof. Varley, the electrician, says there is more in Spiritualism than our philosophy has ever dreamed of. Prof. Phelps, of Andover, admits its so-called supernaturalism, but says he can prove from the Bible that the Devil is the operator and communicator every time. James Freeman Clarke says that during the early years of his ministry he concluded that the narratives about Jesus casting out devils were errors in reporting, but that he has now sufficient evidence to convince him that devils have been cast out in Boston, and hence that Jesus may have done the same. Do not the efforts of orthodoxy to discredit Spiritualism also throw discredit on the supernaturalism of the Old and New Testaments? Are not the phenomena of both identical in their probability, possibility, and credibility, so that they now must stand or fall together? If they can disprove Spiritualism, then, like Samson, they will destroy the Philistines and themselves together.

Those matters, however, cannot be decided by faith, but by facts. Do the alleged phenomena occur as claimed? Eye and ear witnesses are alone admissible in this matter. How can we prove those things for ourselves? Must we all send five dollars and four three cent stamps to J. V. Mansfield, at New York, and then be no better satisfied than before? Cannot the spirits induce some medium to convince the poor of this earth without money and without price? Where is the Jesus or Peter, Luther or Wesley, of this new gospel?

W. G.

FROM THE OLD TO THE NEW.

LIMA, ALLEN CO., OHIO, July 25, 1870.

Dear Sir:—Your paper is valuable to me, not because it is an exponent of my own thinking (for if it were, I should have but small necessity for it), but because it suggests new and valuable thoughts about subjects as old as the universe. And of these I have need. My own views at present (so far as I have definite thoughts) are a growth, irregular and imperfect, as to what is true in religion,—using this word as comprehending all human efforts to realize and improve our ideas of self-advancement as a part of our complete existence—our duty to do good to others and to learn and render obedience to the laws of God, as the Infinite Wisdom who demands duty from us as our sole good. What you call Free Religion seems to me to be what is discovered of the Universal Religion of Humanity, verified by the experience and enlightened conscience of good men of all nations and ages. What this is, I do not think can be now seen, except as "through a glass, darkly;" but you are doing your part to discover and make it visible. It is largely hid in all past "historical religions" (to be allowed your expression), but obscured in these by the accretions and corruptions of time and original imperfections. The "historical" part of Christianity may and will pass away; but its special reverence for charity, holiness of life, and the dignity of humanity, "separated from its accidents," never can be lost, any more than modern discoveries as to the relation of our earth to the Solar System can become lost to astronomy. They form a part of the discoveries of religious truth which accumulate with the advancement of mankind, forming the genuine inspiration in Humanity of God.

Your work in THE INDEX, largely destructive, is partly reconstructive, and both are necessary,—the last the most. It is very painful to have what is best for us to aim at in life, uncertain. Trained in the strictest form of the Christian Church, by which it gives outward manifestation of its inner sense of religion, from peculiar circumstances I became early restless about its truth and sufficiency. The result has been that a mental struggle to realize what is true has, for forty years, been going on in my mind; and as, with added knowledge, I have been compelled to tear from my beliefs what of them came to appear error, the mental separation from the old customary creed or usage has been painful in the extreme. The rules of life and belief taught in childhood by loved relatives are not changed or modified at will; and I confess to a strange, but I think natural, regret at parting from many habits and associations that were a part of my old religious belief, even while compelled to do so by better thinking. And I have had to make the separation with little help from friends or associates. It is a solitary work, and a thankless duty. Doing right in this world, as Shaftesbury says, brings no reward, unless the doing so is its own reward. And surely this is eminently true of those who have to adopt unpopular religious principles.

It is disagreeable, I may add, to live in a transition period in politics or religion; and we live in both. And I must be content, therefore, to continue to strive for a better knowledge of our life-purpose and duty, laboring in hope. And it is because your Free Religious ideals and thoughts, in our brief acquaintance of editor and subscriber, have helped me to clearer views, that I thank you for intelligent, needful and useful suggestions for my better guidance in this class of inquiries. And for this it is that I still want your Journal.

Very respectfully yours,

JAMES MACKENZIE.

The city of Philadelphia, it may not be universally known, exists principally for the glory of Mr. George W. Childs. The Public Ledger of that city is supported by him as a convenient advertising medium, and whenever George makes a speech or gives away a few dollars in charity, the speech or the gift is duly reported in the Ledger, and copies of that paper with the important article surrounded with heavy red lines, are distributed to all the newspapers in the land. All public events are judged of in Philadelphia solely by their influence on George W. Childs, so we are not surprised that the dispatch from the Quaker City announcing the reception of the information of Mr. Dicken's death begins in this wise:—

"Mr. George W. Childs of the Ledger was deeply affected at the news of Mr. Dickens' death. The lamented author was his guest the last time he was in this city, and the strongest ties of friendship existed between them—even stronger perhaps, than in the case of Mr. Childs and the late George Peabody."

Note now delicately the statement is introduced that Mr. Childs once knew Peabody. We fear a mother such bereavement would be too much for him. —Port. Daily Adv.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavins B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

NOW READY!

The Report of the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston last May, has been printed in pamphlet form. This Report contains addresses by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, F. E. Abbot, Samuel Johnson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, Thos. W. Higginson, Wm. Henry Channing and others. The price of the pamphlet is fifty cents; in packages of five or more, thirty cents each. It can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.; also in Boston at Crosby & Damrell's, 100 Washington street, and at the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield street; in Cincinnati of Bloch & Co., 150 West Fourth street, and in Toledo at the office of THE INDEX.

The address of Mr. Channing on the Religions of China, which is a word specially adapted to the times, has also been printed separately, and can be obtained as above for twenty cents a copy.

This is what the Boston Traveller says of our Annual Report:

Crosby & Damrell have sent us a handsome 8vo pamphlet, of 122 pages, containing the third annual report of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston in May last, containing the address and essays, and an outline of the discussions which marked that extraordinary meeting of all sorts of religionists—Jews, Christians, Mohammedans, half-believers, disbelievers, and scoffers. It is, withal, a very instructive pamphlet; showing, as it does, to what the human intellect—even the highly cultivated and refined—may be brought, when once the divinely inspired and authorized guide in matters of religion is rejected. These cultured men and women, many of them with the most kindly natural impulses, having thrown aside the Bible, are now blindly groping about in darkness of their own making, to find out what is true and good; when one flash of light from the Word of God would instantly show them.

We suppose that Col. Higginson must be classed as "Mohammedan," since he it was who contributed some interesting facts about that faith. But we have not yet learned that he has publicly declared himself a Mussulman.

The Boston Transcript says that the Report gives evidence of a compact and lasting organization.

ANOTHER RELIGIOUS SIGN FROM ENGLAND.

A meeting was to have been held in London on the 20th of July, for the purpose of forming a "Theistic Society." At the time of this writing we have not learned the result. Keshub Chunder Sen appears to have given his influence for the movement, and other Hindus together with several English gentlemen and ladies are interested in it. The London Inquirer (Unitarian) gives the following account of the proposed meeting, but predicts that the movement "will never come to anything":—

A proposal is now in circulation under the auspices of Babu Chunder Sen, together with other Hindus and a number of English gentlemen, for the formation of a "Theistic Society" in this country. The "objects" of the Society are stated as follows:—"1. The objects of the Society are to unite men, notwithstanding any difference in their religious creeds, in a common effort to attain and diffuse purity of spiritual life by (1.) investigating religious truth; (2.) cultivating devotional feelings; and (3.) furthering practical morality. 2. The Society seeks to attain these objects by the following means:—(1.) By holding meetings for the reading of papers, and for conference. (2.) By holding and encouraging meetings for the united worship of God. (3.) By helping its members to ascertain and discharge their personal and social duties. (4.) By the formation of similar societies with the same objects in various parts of the British empire and other countries. (5.) By correspondence with those who may be supposed willing to assist in the objects of this Society. (6.) By the issue of publications calculated to promote the above purposes, this Society is offered as a means of uniting all those who believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, in the endeavor to supplement their individual efforts towards goodness and truth by mutual sympathy; to intensify their trust in and love to God by fellowship in worship; and to aid each other in the discovery and propagation of spiritual truth, that thus they may attain to the more complete observance of the Divine laws of human nature." A meeting is to be held at the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen street, London, on Wednesday, the 20th of July, at 7 P. M., "for the purpose of definitely constituting the Society." Among the names appended to the circular are Miss S. D. Collett, Miss Blackwell, Mr. W. Shaen, Mr. M. D. Conway, Mr. E. Vansittart Neale, and two Unitarian ministers, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, of Bridgewater, and the Rev. P. W. Wicksteed, of Dukinfield.

IS IT A FAILURE?

It is to be hoped that all persons who think that Mr. Samuel Johnson's ministry and the Free Church at Lynn have been a failure, because after seventeen years of service he has resigned and the society proposes to disband, will read his farewell discourse, entitled "A Ministry in Free Religion." In this discourse he states clearly what has been attempted in the Free Church and what has been done. We have no hesitation in saying that we wish the Society might not dissolve; but no work can be considered a failure into which have gone such rare ability and earnestness, and such a pure, single purpose to serve truth and humanity. In a part of the discourse he thus sums up the main principles of his teaching:—

Here, then, I have spoken, during these eventful years, to whomsoever there might be that would hear. I have taught Natural Religion: its intuitions of God, and duty, and immortality, and freedom; its cares and disciplines; its processes of integral growth; its adequacy for all human needs; its strong arm in the sorrows of life, and its upward look through death; its acceptance of all pure pleasures and becoming cultures; its lordship over forms and days and written commandments; the sweetness and strength of its life in God; its gospel of the soul's essential relations to eternal rectitude, and to the sovereignty of nature and life; its root in present Deity, an inspiration that interprets and judges the past.

I have taught that there is no other Divine Word than Essential Humanity, and that this is shadowed forth in symbol by the order, beauty, and use of the universe; in those meaning of outward nature which I have so often sought to interpret in sermons from the mountains and the sea.

I have taught the Natural Religion of Character, which knows no difference of Christian, Parsi, Mussulman, or Jew; a deeper insight, that sees both how often the title, or even the claim, of Atheist may be but a misunderstanding of terms, and how far it is from affecting the realities of being and worth.

Thus teaching Natural Religion, I have welcomed all special faiths, Christianity included, only in so far as they contain elements of this Universal Religion, are free of exclusive masterisms, and harmonize with the liberty and science of this better day than either Plato or Jesus saw. It has often been asked, and especially by those who have not chosen to hear me for themselves, to what religion I belonged, and where I was to be counted? My only answer could be, "You shall count me nowhere; but you shall exclude me nowhere. I will have the freedom of all times and all hearts; but I will, of my own motion, take on the special bonds, and wear the special labels, of none."

I have taught the adequacy of the human faculties, and that all ultimate authority is given in and through them alone. I have urged the unity of our three-fold moral relation,—to God, to ourselves, to others: in other words, of Worship, Culture, and Love; and I have set forth, as I could, the mischievous separation of these ideas and spheres in the prevailing creeds, and the re-action thereof upon the theory of human justice and the character of penal laws. I have taught the fallacy of believing either in a mediator between the soul and God, or in the perfection of Jesus; of whom we know little with certainty, and that little marked with error as well as with wisdom, and who in many important respects is no safe leader for any man now: the fallacy, also, of believing in the attestation of spiritual truths by miracle or special providence, or any form of interference with natural law; or in one historical plan of salvation, in some way intended to turn upon the pivot of the Christian religion; or in any prescriptive authority in the name of special revelation. And these fallacies I have sought to refer to their true origin in natural needs ill-understood, in the half-lights of spiritual instinct; and set their errors aside to make way for the positive teaching of the immediateness of Deity, in the best ideals of the mind and the heart, in the constancy of revelation, in what was really great in Jesus and in others, and in the universality of religious and moral truth. I have pointed to the noble elements in every error, as the ground of the currency it has had until better light has made adherence to it an anachronism and a superstition. It is of little value to break up old foundations without laying broader ones. And if I have emphasized anything, it has been the truth that positive culture is the final purpose of all right negations. Doubtless this is not so easy as to destroy. And I do not claim to have escaped the fate of standing, even in many well-wishing minds, associated rather with what I have done here in removing old errors, than with what I may perhaps have done to implant new faith and broader life. The limits of personal influence I have spoken of already have not failed to appear; and the satisfaction at escaping superstitions has, I think, sometimes hidden the path that should lead onward from the vantage-ground to a more ideal interest and culture. But in the barren field of mere negation it has been no habit of my own to linger. I would, if I might, make one and the same breath say, in every one of us, to the error, "Vanish!" and to the truth, "Come clear!"

POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

ROBERT MOLESWORTH, who was created Viscount Molesworth in the Irish peerage, A. D. 1716, was for many years the English envoy in Denmark. After resigning his post, he wrote an account of the country and its institutions that proved very offensive to that Government, particularly as the author's conclusions were incontrovertibly true. The Danish Ambassador in England went in full court dress and magnificent indignation to St. James's. He told the King (William III.) that if a Dane had dared so to speak of the English system of Government, the Danish monarch, on catching him, would have cut off his head. "Ah, I can't do that," said the less absolute King of England, "but I tell you what I can do—I will let Molesworth know what you say, and he shall put it in the next edition of his book."

MISS ISABELLA M., of Dundee, is one of the smartest of her sex. A gentleman remarked to her, "What fine dark hair you have got, Miss M. My wife, who is much younger than you, has her hair quite gray." "Indeed?" rejoined Miss M., "if I had been your wife, my hair no doubt had been gray too."

Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, EDITOR.

THE HUMILITY OF FREE RELIGION.

[Read to the partially formed "Independent Society," Dover, N. H., July 28, 1868, just before the summer vacation.]

When the little band of Pilgrims were on the eve of departure from Holland, and looked forward to a long and dangerous voyage across the Atlantic in the little Mayflower of only one hundred and eighty tons burden, John Robinson, their venerable and venerated pastor, bade them farewell in a most memorable discourse, from which I extract the following noble passage:—

"Brethren, we are now quickly to part from one another; and whether I may live to see your faces any more, the God of heaven only knows; but whether the Lord has appointed that or no, I charge you before God and his blessed angels that you follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ. If God reveal anything to you by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded that the Lord has more truth yet to break out of his holy Word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the Reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go, at present, no farther than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw; whatever part of his will our God has revealed to Calvin, they will die rather than embrace it; and the Calvinists, you see, stick yet where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things. This is a misery much to be lamented; for, though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God, but were they now living, would be as willing to embrace further light as that which they first received."

Let this glorious avowal of faith in progress serve as a text for what I have to say this morning. The spirit which breathes throughout the entire passage has been the spirit of genuine radicals in all ages. John Robinson, Christian and Puritan though he was, believed devoutly in the inspiration of his own times, and looked to the future for fresh unveilings of spiritual truth; he bewailed the tendency of the church to follow its great leaders so slavishly as to stop where they stopped; he perceived the limitations of them all, and urged his own flock not to imitate this slavishness, but rather in the spirit of independence to obey the inward revelations of God.

Doubtless John Robinson believed that the new truth he yearned for would "break out of God's holy Word," that is, the Bible; and he saw not that he himself followed Jesus as slavishly as the Reformed churches followed Luther and Calvin. Do not, then, misconceive my meaning. I am very far from saying that Robinson completely broke the yoke of human authority,—very far from claiming him as upholding in all their breadth the principles I would myself uphold. No, he only discarded human leadership so far as he saw it to be slavery; and it was reserved for later times to see that all human leadership in spiritual things, no matter who claims to be leader, is slavery, and slavery alone. But I do claim that Robinson and his little handful of brave, determined hearers represented in their day, although imperfectly, the great principle of spiritual freedom; and that the radicals of to-day are fighting in the same most noble cause. It is true that, in these times of higher civilization, there is no longer danger of the extreme persecution that well-nigh destroyed our forefathers; but is the spirit of persecution dead? There is need to-day of the same calm, inflexible, self-sacrificing devotion to liberty that led our ancestors into the wilderness; there is need of the same determined protest against spiritual bondage that first planted the seed of a free commonwealth on the wintry coasts of Plymouth. The battle of to-day is not about the authority of Luther or Calvin, but about the authority of the Master of these. A deeper issue, and a more desperate warfare, friends,—let us not disguise it from ourselves or others. We are not, like our forefathers, throwing off the yoke of underlings to accept the yoke of their Superior, but we are throwing off the yoke of the Superior himself, that we may serve God in perfect freedom. We are resisting the outward law, that we may obey the inward law; for this is the use of liberty, to work out UNIMPEDED the natural development of our humanity. No human leader, high or low—but the Divine Leader dwelling in our own souls!—is not this the completion of the Pilgrim's struggle,—the ripening of the seed so heroically planted by Robinson himself,—the real "breaking forth" of that truth for which he looked, not out of the Bible, but out of the "holy word" of the human spirit itself?

Assuredly I believe it; and to read the grand prediction of that veritable prophet makes my own heart throb with sympathy and fresh faith in our common cause. Here, my friends, I believe that we have found a new Plymouth Rock,—here are we landing on the shores of a new and higher civilization—here, if we are faithful, will come our children and our children's children to rejoice in this place of small beginnings, and to thank God that out of the tiny acorn has sprung the magnificent, over-arching oak. Let us bear the heat of the day, and bide our time; the harvest of ideas is tardy in proportion to its worth. The world sees not the meaning of our work; but silently, faithfully, reverently, let us build on the corner-stone of free Humanity the temple of a nobler future. I wish no better blessing for you than that you may all realize the profound religiousness, the eternal and supreme value, of the truths upon which we, a little and unpopular company, have taken our stand. Depend upon it, they are the Plymouth Rock of a new era.

In reflecting on the parting words of John Robinson to the Pilgrim Fathers, I have been equally struck with two traits of his character, which most persons would say at first are incompatible,—his exceeding boldness and his exceeding humility. On the one hand, he leans not at all on those great masters of the churches, Luther and Calvin; he scruples not to be expectant of insight into larger truths than they beheld, which must be accepted solely on testimony of the inward witness. Here we have that calm reliance on the native greatness of the soul, as superior to all its instructors, which is characteristic of the true radical. On the other hand, he relies with the trusting docility of childhood on the teachings of the spirit of Truth itself, as identical with all private insights. In other words, he has attained that central verity of radicalism which proclaims the absolute oneness of Nature and Revelation. God's truths are the soul's intuitions. To realize this in conscious experience is to be saved from all self-conceit,—is to be made humble in the inmost recesses of the spirit.

Hence I see that the equal boldness and humility of Robinson are but different sides of his profound radicalism, since his faith in the native power of the soul to perceive new truth is at bottom faith in the ever-revealing God of truth.

There was never yet a genuine radical who did not exhibit these two extremes of deep humility and impregnable independence,—of self-assertion and self-surrender,—of manly faith in his own soul as against all external dictation, and of modest trust in God as against all seductions of spiritual pride. There is no more striking proof of the common saying that "extremes meet," than in the union of these apparently incompatible traits of independence and humility. Faith in self and faith in God become one and the same, when God is found to be that which is universal in the very life of self, the secret fountain of all our powers. Thus the radical spirit of self-reliance, of faith in the soul as perfect master of its own thought and act, is the realization of devout and tender dependence on the Universal Life as inwardly made known. Therefore by perfect independence of man and perfect dependence upon God is the true radical in religion characterized. This is the secret of the true greatness of Jesus. Was there ever a more notable instance of self-confidence conjoined with faith in God? Obedient to the inward law, what cared he for the law of man, even though it pretended to be the law of God? Well he knew that the law of God was within, and not without; and how majestically he put his foot on the arbitrary usurpations of his fellow-man! Therein was he a radical of the radicals; and if he had forborne to assert his own claim to Lordship, thereby denying to others the freedom he had so magnificently won for himself, and thus in some measure impairing the beauty and perfectness of his own character, he would not now stand in a false relation to the progress of mankind. Yet, despite this claim, the influence of his two-fold faith in himself and in God has been so mighty, that the world owes him an incalculable debt, which none is more prompt to appreciate than he who declines to bow the knee before him, deeming it a part of religion to stand upright before his fellow-men.

The humility which is thus born of independence or spiritual freedom is the only humility that deserves the name. There is a false humility which is simply want of faith in self,—which takes on trust the teachings of another, and adopts them as law of conduct without daring to test them, or to bring them on trial before the inward tribunal of the soul. Is it humble to stifle all doubts and choke down all inward questionings, when these doubts and questionings originate in our own God-given faculties? Is it humble thus to distrust God, and in his stead to trust the claims of a fellow-man? Is it humble to put greater faith in a book of human origin than in the instincts of the soul which can have no origin but God himself? Humility of this sort is not humility, but mock humility, fear, cowardice, want of faith in God. When the Christians thus bind themselves hand and foot in blind acceptance of gospel precepts, they may honor the Christ, but they dishonor God. They profess to believe that God has created the soul with all its powers; true humility would teach them to accept his creation as good, and not to fear that the use of powers thus bestowed would involve impiety or lead to spiritual harm.

The noble course is the reverse of theirs. If a doubt occurs naturally, follow it as a guide-post to higher truth. To fear the natural working of the soul is to fear that God blundered in making it what it is. Fearless and free employment of all our faculties in pursuit of truth and in ascertainment of duty is the only way to accept the workmanship of God as perfect. The moment we overrule the inward verdict of reason or crush a single scruple of conscience, even though it be in deference to the authority of the Christ himself, we set the work of man above the work of God, and silence the whispers of his spirit. Man made the Bible, God made the soul; a true humility bids us to trust God more than man. There is, therefore, no real humility in distrusting our own faculties out of reverence for other people's faculties, in questions of spiritual truth; but true humility and true independence point in one and the same way.

There was as much religion as wisdom in Robinson's anticipation of "more light"; for this was but another mode of saying that God is neither dead nor dumb, but an ever-living Revealer of truth to man through the constant inspirations of his indwelling spirit. How profound a faith throbs in the old man's words! And how wonderfully has that faith been justified! Bidding you now good-by for a brief season, as I trust, and yet remembering how uncertain are all human expectations, what better can I do than, in the spirit of his words, to bid you watch ever for the breaking of more light into your souls, and to charge you to follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the spirit of truth and love? Were those the last words I should ever utter here, how could I better them? I seek no disciples of my own, —I seek but to help you all to become disciples of the truth in your own souls. Here and everywhere, now and at all times, may we grow daily more and more profoundly convinced of the reality and sufficiency of this transcendent faith! With mingled humility before God, and independence before man, may we prove the truth of our ideas by the beauty of our lives, knowing that, after all, by that test must our faith be judged! Follow, then, not me, but that inward guide, into higher truth and grander peace and purer life and larger love!

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC POSITION ON THE EDUCATIONAL QUESTION.

[The April number of the Catholic World, the leading Catholic publication of the country, contains the following statement of the position of the Catholic Church on the question of education.]

"Hitherto the attempt has been made to meet the difficulty by excluding from the public schools what the State calls sectarianism—that is, whatever is distinctive of any particular denomination, or peculiar to it—and allowing to be introduced only what is common to all, or, as it is called, "Our common Christianity." This would, perhaps, meet the difficulty, if the several denominations were only different varieties of Protestantism. But this solution is impracticable where the division is not between Protestant sects only, but between Protestants and Catholics. The difference between Catholics and Protestants is not a difference in details only, but a difference in principle. Catholicity must be taught as a whole, in its unity and integrity, or not taught at all. It must be all, or nothing. To exclude from the schools all that is distinctive or peculiar to Catholicity, is simply to exclude Catholicity itself, and to make the schools either purely Protestant, or purely secular, and therefore hostile to our religion, and such as in conscience we can not support.

"The exclusion of the Bible would not help the matter. If some Catholics, in particular localities, have supposed that the exclusion of the Protestant Bible from the public schools would remove the objection to them as schools for Catholic children, they have fallen into a very great mistake. The question lies deeper than reading or not reading the Bible in the schools, in one version or another. We object to them, not merely because they teach more or less of Protestant religion, but also upon the ground that we can not freely and fully teach our religion, and train up our children in them to be true and unwavering Catholics.

"Three solutions have been suggested: 1. To exclude the Bible and all religious teaching, or recognition, in any way, shape or manner, of religion from the public schools. This is the infidel or secular solution, and so far as Catholics are concerned, it is no solution at all. It is simple mockery. 2. To adopt in education the voluntary system, as we do in religion, and leave each denomination to maintain schools at its own expense. We could accept this solution, as Catholics, without any serious objection; but we foresee some trouble in disposing of the educational funds held by several of the States in trust for common schools, academies and colleges, and in determining to whom shall belong the school-houses and academy and college buildings and fixtures, erected at the public expense. 3. To divide the schools between Catholics and Protestants and to assign to each the amount proportioned to the number of children each has to educate. To the Israelites we would grant separate schools, if they demand them. To each Protestant denomination, not at all, unless each denomination can put in an honest plea of conscience (!) for such a division. As to what shall be done with the large body of citizens who are neither Catholics or Protestants—such citizens, we reply, have no religion, and they who have no religion have no conscience that people who have religion are bound to respect. If they refuse to send their children either to the Hebrew schools or the Catholic schools, or, in fine, to the Protestant schools, let them found schools of their own, at their own expense."

After these solutions, we have the following statement:

"First. The American State is as much Catholic as it is Protestant, and really harmonizes better with Catholicism than Protestantism. We hold that, instead of decatholicising Catholic children, it is far more necessary, if we are to be governed by reasons of this sort, to unmake the children of Protestants of their Protestantism. We really believe that, in order to train them up to be, in the fullest sense, true, loyal and exemplary citizens, such as can alone arrest the downward tendency of the republic, they must become good Catholics."

"Second. Before God, or in the spiritual order, we recognize no equality between Protestantism and Catholicity. Before God, no man has any right to be of any religion but the Catholic."

"Third. We place our demand for separate schools on the ground of conscience, and therefore of right—the right of God as well as of men. Our conscience forbids us to support schools at the public expense from which our religion is excluded, and in which our children are taught either what we hold to be a false or mutilated religion, or no religion at all."

"Exclude Catholicity, and what is left? Nothing of Christianity but Protestantism, which is simply Christianity minus the Catholic Church, her faith, precepts and sacraments."

THE GERM THEORY.

[From the London Lancet for July 9.]

It has been the lot of Professor Tyndall, by his lecture on Dust and Disease, to excite or to quicken in the public mind an interest about a scientific problem of the deepest importance, but of such a nature that, until then, its very conditions were known only to the scientific. It has since been discussed, with more or less display of ignorance of these conditions, by a large proportion of the general press. Amid or beneath all this turmoil, and quite independently of it, the work of real investigation has been going on; and Dr. Charlton Bastian has put forth, in Nature, what is perhaps the most important contribution yet made towards the solution of the great question that really underlies all controversies about germs. That question is, to determine whether there is any line of demarcation between animate and inanimate matter—any essential difference between vital and mere physical properties—any such thing as life except as the sum of actions depending upon forces that are strictly correlative with motion, and that, like heat or light, are merely the expressions of the conversions of motions under given conditions. Dr. Bastian himself states the problem by comparing the commencement of a low organism to the commencement of a crystal; and argues that we have no more reason to infer the pre-existence of a germ in one case than in the other. He details an elaborate series of experiments, seemingly performed with all due care, and showing, as far as they go, that low forms of life become developed in organic fluids without the presence of air, absolutely in vacuo, and in fluids that have been previously raised to temperatures that are universally believed to be destructive to the vitality of all known germs. And not in organic fluids only, but in saline solutions, and in saline solutions containing no carbon, and in which that element has been replaced by silicon. Such results, when the experiments producing them have been properly repeated and tested by other observers, will go far to strike at the root of whole systems of thought that are at present cherished by large numbers of earnest people. And yet, as we have often had occasion to maintain, the doctrine of germs, and especially of the germinal origin of disease, almost requires the doctrine of spontaneous generation as its complement. A germinal theory may serve to explain the occasional rapid or extensive diffusion of epidemics; but it encounters overwhelming difficulties when called upon to explain their commencement. The facts of life point almost irresistibly to the conclusion that epidemic diseases may originate de novo from certain combinations of conditions; and it is hardly possible to believe that the germs of all past or present pestilences were coeval in their beginnings with the peopling of the earth by man; and yet, if not, and if these pestilences do indeed depend upon living and organic self-multiplying poisons, the doctrine of spontaneous generation would be at once established. The conditions which called such poisons into existence must be themselves capable of precise repetition; and the cause being present, the effect will surely follow. To our minds, this mode of considering the question gives to sanitary work a far higher aim, and a far more definite object, than it would otherwise possess; and points to the permanent maintenance of a high standard of physical or moral cleanliness as the only means of preserving a high standard of public health. We do not, of course, in any way pledge ourselves to the correctness of Dr. Bastian's conclusions; but we desire to call the attention of our readers to their importance, and to the original paper in which they may be found. Dr. Bastian has a work upon the subject in progress; and his papers in Nature may be regarded as pilot balloons, sent up to show him the directions in which his views will be criticized, and the nature of the attacks to which they will be subjected. We confess to a hope that they may hereafter be proved to be true. Their complete establishment would greatly simplify some of the most difficult problems by which life is beset; and would confer lasting fame upon an earnest and truth-seeking worker.

GERMAN UNITY.

SPEECH OF REV. DR. F. H. HEDGE

At the German War-meeting, in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Wednesday evening, July 27, 1870.

Mr. Chairman:—In a meeting of Germans, assembled in the interest of Germany, I, an American, am invited to take part. For this honor I am indebted, not to any special vocation for the platform, but to the interest which all who know me are aware that I feel and have always felt in the good estate of the German people and the glory of the German name. [Applause.] For, though an American by birth, by citizenship, by civil obligation, and loving loyalty, I am a German by intellectual descent. Your country in one sense is also mine. It is the fatherland of my mind. It was there I first drew the breath of intellectual life; it was there I imbibed my first ideas of poetry and philosophy; it was in Germany that I made my first essays in prose and verse. All that I am intellectually I owe to your country, to her schools and her books. When, therefore, I received your invitation to be present at this meeting, I felt in gratitude and honor bound to obey the call, though conscious of my inability to add anything but the unit of my voice to your cause.

When civil war raged in this country, a German, advanced in years, a scholar and professor, offered his services as a private soldier to the government of the United States. I am not in a condition to imitate such gallantry. I can give to the cause of Germany only my voice. My heart is with you. Unreservedly I side with Prussia in her struggles against France. [Applause.] It seems to me that every patriotic American must do the same. And I believe it will be found that those of our people who most ardently embraced the cause of the Union in our own recent war are with you in yours. They are consistent in their espousal of your cause, for this too is a war in defense of a union; a war on the Prussian side for the union of Germany, on the side of Napoleon a war against that union. A united Germany, the grand inspiration of Bismarck, is the real aim of Napoleon's iniquitous assault. Prussia, under Bismarck's lead, desires a strong united Germany; Napoleon wants Germany to continue politically weak as in years past, and hence the war he is waging against her. He has the impudence to pretend that he is not warring against Germany, but against Prussia. We know what that means. If the States of North Germany, which Prussia is seeking to unite, will separate themselves from her, Napoleon will not bombard their cities nor lay waste their lands. But I say that to war against Prussia is to war against the German States; it is to war against the interest which they all have in common. It is to untwist the cord which Bismarck has been twisting. It is to lick the cement from national union. It is to pulverize Germany. [Applause.]

The weakness of Germany in former times has been her division into petty States. Mr. Chairman, I need not remind you of the history of your country. You know there was a time when Germany was a power, and the strongest secular power in the councils of Europe, or rather, I should say, of Western Christendom; for Europe there was not. Metternich declared Italy to be a "geographical expression." From the beginning of the tenth century to the beginning of the fourteenth, from Henry the Fowler to Charles IV., and especially in the days of the Saxon emperors, Germany was the supreme power among the secular sovereignties of the West. Why did that power decline? How was the secular overmight of Germany lost? The cause is not far to seek. Other nations, England, France, Spain, grew relatively strong by consolidation, and outstripped her, outweighed her. That process of concentration which made out of many petty sovereignties one France, one England, one Spain, was never accomplished, was never until now attempted in Germany.

Germany remained disunited, and therefore relatively weak. Foremost in science and art, she is politically weak. In Goettingen, two years ago, a learned professor, chafing, as a Hanoverian, against the absorption of Hanover, pleaded with me, who ventured to rejoice in that consummation, that Germany was designed to be a "Bundesstaat," which you will allow me to translate liberally, a bundle of states. [Laughter and applause.] Said I, "Mr. Professor, your country has had now a thousand years of Bundesstaat, and nothing but political weakness has come of it. Is it not worth the while to try what virtue there may be in consolidation?"

The experiment of consolidation Bismarck and Prussia are now trying. As a political power, Germany stands or falls with the success of that experiment. Napoleon hopes to crush the attempt; to destroy that union in the bud.

I have no fear for the result of the conflict. Prussia is fighting as we fought, in self-defence, in defence of the Union. She has right on her side, and is strong in the consciousness of that right. Napoleon is the aggressor. If an unjust cause is weakness, that weakness cleaves to his banners. It is in vain for him to say that the responsibility of war rests not with the nation that declares it, but with the nation which makes that declaration necessary. No such necessity exists in this case. The pretext is a lie! Before high heaven it is a lie! [Applause.] The final judgment of mankind will declare it to be such, and will pronounce this war of aggression to be one of the most wanton and wicked that ever arrayed nation against nation.

I have no fear for the final result. The French may win some first successes, but in the long run German valor and German steadfastness and German patriotism will prevail. [Applause.] And this will prove to be once more, as against the first Napoleon, the "Deutsche Jagd Auf Henkersblut und Tyrannen." [Applause.] The Emperor has tauntingly reminded Prussia that the French have not forgotten the way to Jena. It is true there was a Jena, a disastrous battle of Jena, in the history of Prussia; but let the imperial braggart remember, and let France remember, that there was a Leipzig, which more than retrieved the misfortunes of Jena. [Applause.] There was a Leipzig, and after that what? After that Elba, and Waterloo, and finally St. Helena! [Applause.]

It was said of Pope Boniface VIII. that "he came in like a fox, ruled like a lion, and died like a dog." Napoleon III. came in like a fox; he stole the diadem he wears, if ever diadem was stolen by usurper. [Applause.] He has ruled like a lion by intimidation and brute force; and if, to complete the parallel, in the issue of this conflict which he has provoked he shall die like a dog, neither you nor I will quarrel with the course of events, and I doubt if France herself will greatly lament that doom. [Applause.]

THE FATHERLAND.

[From the German of Arndt.]

Where is the German's fatherland?
Is't Prussia? Suabia? Is't the strand
Where grows the vine, where flows the Rhine?
Is't where the gull skims Baltic's brine?
No; yet more great and far more grand
Must be the German's fatherland!

How call they then the German's land?
Bavaria? Brunswick? Hast thou scanned
It where the Zuyder Zee extends?
Where Styrian toil the iron bends?
No, brother, no; thou hast not spanned
The German's genuine fatherland!

Is then the German's fatherland
Westphalia? Pomerania? Stand
Where Zurich's waveless water sleeps;
Where Weser winds, where Danube sweeps;
Hast found it now? Not yet! Demand
Elsewhere the German fatherland!

Then say, where lies the German's land?
How call they that unconquered land?
Is't where Tyrol's green mountains rise?
The Switzer's land I dearly prize,
By freedom's purest breezes fanned—
But no, 'tis not the German's land!

Where, therefore, lies the German's land?
Baptize that great, that ancient land!
'Tis surely Austria, proud and bold,
In wealth unmatched, in glory old!
Oh! none shall write her name on sand;
But she is not the German's land!

Say, then, where lies the German land?
Baptize that great, that ancient land!
Is't Alsace? or Lorraine—the gem
Wrenched from the imperial diadem
By wiles which princely treachery planned?
No; these are not the German's land!

Where, therefore, lies the German's land!
Name now, at last, that mighty land!
Where'er resounds the German tongue—
Where German hymns to God are sung—
There, gallant brother, take thy stand,
That is the German's fatherland!

That is his land, the land of lands,
Where vows bind less than clasped hands;
Where valor lights the flashing eye;
Where love and truth in deep hearts lie,
And zeal enkindles freedom's brand;
That is the German's fatherland!

That is the German's fatherland!
Great God! look down and bless that land!
And give her noble children souls
To cherish, while existence rolls,
And love with heart, and aid with hand,
That universal fatherland!

NAPOLÉONIC BOMBAST.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

Of the ridiculous fustian which the Emperor Napoleon telegraphed to the Empress at Paris concerning himself and his son Louis at the battle of Saarbrücken—

"Louis has received his baptism of fire. He was admirably cool and little impressed. A division of Frossard's command carried the heights overlooking Saar. The Prussians made a brief resistance. Louis and I were in front, where the bullets fell about us. Louis keeps a ball he picked up. The soldiers wept at his tranquility.—NAPOLÉON."

the New York Democrat very worthily says:—"Suppose Abe Lincoln had taken his boy 'Tad' out to Arlington Heights at the beginning of the war, and got on a barn and witnessed a little picket-firing a mile off, and then telegraphed to his wife that 'Tad' had received his baptism of fire, and that the soldiers blew their noses to see how tranquil he sat a-straddle of the roof of the barn—it would have been as sensible as Napoleon's dispatch."

The world at large is now joining in the laugh which the Democrat illustrates.

THE LA CYGNE INSTITUTE.

[From the La Cuygne (Kansas) Journal.]

Last Sunday at 11 A. M., Joel Moody delivered a discourse in Heath's Hall, on "The Old and the New." This struck the key note to a new organization. Notice was then given that there would be a meeting at 8 o'clock in the evening for the purpose of considering the question of organizing a society for the promotion of liberal religion, and of social intellectual improvement.

Considering the rain storm, the meeting was well attended, but adjourned from the hall to the residence of Dr. Heath.

A temporary organization was had by calling Mr. Moody to the chair, who briefly stated the object of the meeting. G. V. Demorest was elected Secretary.

The following resolution was introduced and discussed at length, which fully brought out all the phases of new and old organizations:—

Resolved, 1. That the time has come for those in La Cygne who can no longer find the wants of their moral and intellectual nature satisfied in the Christian church, to organize.

2. That the basis of such organization be broad and scientific, welcoming all to membership who are in search after truth, and accepting the conclusions of science on all subjects.

3. That the object of such organization shall be to advance the social, moral and intellectual culture of its members.

The resolution was adopted as a declaration of principles of the organization.

It was then unanimously voted that we organize under the statute of Kansas as a corporate body. Articles of association were then adopted, specifying the name, purpose, place of business, term of existence, &c., &c.

The corporate name is the "La Cygne Institute," and the purpose for which this corporation is created is to promote science and the fine arts, the maintenance of a library and public reading-room, and the investigation and promulgation of truth.

It was also voted that the proceedings of the meeting be published in the La Cygne Journal.

G. V. DEMOREST, Secretary.

CAN LIFE BE INDEFINITELY SUSPENDED?

[From Appleton's Journal.]

A distinguished Swedish chemist, Dr. Grusselbach, a professor of the University of Upsal, has come to the conclusion that those Egyptian mummies which are found in the ancient tombs on the Nile in a complete state—that is to say, without having been deprived of their brains and entrails, like most mummies—are not embalmed at all, but "are really the bodies of individuals whose life has been momentarily suspended, with the intention of restoring them at some future time, only the secret of preservation was lost." Prof. Grusselbach adduces many proofs in support of his idea—among others, his experiments during the past ten years, which he says, have always proved successful. He took a snake and treated it in such a manner as to benumb it as though it had been carved in marble, and it was so brittle that, had he allowed it to fall, it would have broken into fragments. In this state he kept it for several years, and then restored it to life by sprinkling it with a stimulating fluid, the composition of which is a secret. For fifteen years the snake has been undergoing an existence composed of successive deaths and resurrections, apparently without sustaining harm. The Professor is reported to have sent a petition to his government, requesting that a criminal who had been condemned to death may be given to him to be treated in the same manner as the snake, promising to restore him to life again in two years. It is understood that the man undergoing this experiment is to be pardoned. Of course, if a man can be kept in a state of suspended animation for two years, he may be kept for two thousand years, and, if the Professor succeeds, we may lay up a few of our contemporaries for exhibition in the thirty-ninth century.

A statistical genius declares that "more is expended in the United States for cigars than all the common schools in the country." A wag, undoubtedly a lover of the weed, seeing the statement going through the papers, gets off the following:—

"It has been estimated that the cost of washing linen that might just as well be worn two days longer, amounts to enough in this country to defray the expenses of the American Board of Foreign Missions. The expenses of buttons on the backs of our coats, where they are of no earthly use, is equal to the support of all our orphan asylums. It is estimated that the value of old boots thrown aside, which might have been worn at least a day longer, is more than enough to buy flannel night-gowns for every baby in the land. Also, that the cost of every inch on the full shirt collars of our young men is equal to the sum necessary to put a Bible into the hands of every Patagonian giant."

A LONG JOB.—An anatomical observer asserted a few days since that there were 489,981 feathers on the wings of a butterfly. "I don't believe it," said one of his hearers. "Then count them yourself," was the reply.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"For some time I have been the delighted recipient of THE INDEX—your unerring pointer unto truth—and I have been censurably tardy in acknowledging it. Be assured I have not been the less gratified with its tone, course, and appearance—and with entire cordiality I wish it success, and mean not only to think the good word, but, just as soon as time permits, desire to send some thoughts that you may use or not as your judgment shall decide. I really hope it is as successful as your most sanguine expectations could desire. It is needed as the half-way house between our eastern and western civilization, and I trust will take a traveller in and 'do for him,' even though he be a radical peace man. What say you to upholding the principle of the right to life, right to freedom, right to conscience—right to all 'those things which make for peace?'"

"I have been a subscriber for Mendum's paper for many years, but I do not think it presses heavy enough on the main point, 'organization.' There are enough of us about here, but we are powerless to enlarge the area of mental independence. As a body, I think we might do something, but our opinions are generally so unpopular that singly we stand a poor chance. I have enclosed ten cents for two sample copies, which I beg you will send at two different times. I shall then stand a better chance of getting one, as my family make a merit of destroying all literature of that description."

"I trust the criticism of the Watchman and Reflector did not hurt you very badly, and hope they will only sharpen your pen for an honest and more vigorous defence of the true principles of our common nature. If a word of cheer from an humble source will afford you never so little encouragement, how glad we should be to afford that little! Go on,—you have struck the right chord, which is vibrating and discoursing fine harmony in all intelligent, unbiased minds."

"Enclosed you will find one dollar for THE INDEX to the end of the year. I find that I sicken of all other religious papers except the staunch orthodox. The leaders of Unitarianism are half fools and half knaves. I mean to stand aloof from all their conferences, and I expect the ministers about me in consequence will stand aloof from me. But there will be no loss without some small gain."

"I like the paper very much. It suits me the best of any I have yet seen—or rather, the views it advances harmonize with mine the best of any. I think it in advance of any other 'liberal' paper now printed. Am glad to know that it has received sufficient encouragement to make it an established thing for the future. May it ever prosper!"

"Your tardy notice of the oft 'damning by faint praise' of honesty, made me tingle. THE INDEX is a blessing sufficient for the week, each number bringing me some new thought."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are suspended during the months of July and August.

RADICAL CLUB.—There will be no meeting of the Radical Club next Sunday, August 28.

A CALL ON OUR FELLOW-CITIZENS.—Under the most trifling pretexts, the perjured despot governing France declared war against our Fatherland. It has arisen like one man to repel the threatened invasion. The valor of our countrymen has nearly vanquished the wily aggressor, but the wounds of thousands and thousands of the gallant defenders, the needs of the widows and orphans of the slain, appeal to the sympathy of the charitable of both hemispheres.

When this country was deluged by the waves of an unprovoked war, Germany responded with alacrity to the calls for aid from this side; her sons enlisted under the starry banner, regardless whether they owed allegiance to it or not; her savings were invested in our loans, trusting in the success of the cause of freedom for their security. The time has come to return her kindness and recognize their confidence.

The committees appointed by the Toledo German Aid Society will call upon our citizens for their mite towards alleviating the sufferings caused by the war in defence of German independence and honor. Let each respond according to his will and means.

A NEW RADICAL ORGANIZATION.

On our third page will be found a report of the formation of the "La Cygne Institute," at La Cygne, Kansas. This new association, which is to all intents and purposes a Radical Club, was formed immediately after a lecture by Mr. Joel Moody, whom the readers of THE INDEX will recognize as the contributor of some excellent articles to its columns. The movement commands our heartiest sympathy, as will also every similar movement, in whatever quarter and under whatever name. We cordially invite the secretaries of all such liberal bodies to transmit brief reports of their formation and proceedings for publication in THE INDEX. We shall be very glad to make our columns a medium of communication between these Clubs and the public, and have no doubt that radicals will be thereby encouraged to form similar clubs in many other places.

We are in earnest in this matter. The time has come for the organization of Radical Clubs all over the country. We have been idle long enough. Never before was there such a fermentation going on in the public mind as now. From all parts of the land we are in receipt of letters which prove a deep and wide-spread and constantly increasing interest in all questions connected with liberal ideas and liberal movements. The tide is setting strongly towards the realization of a higher social, intellectual, and religious freedom than is yet anywhere to be found. And this growing interest means more than a mere restless discontent with established institutions or prevalent superstitions; it means a positive hunger for ideas, for truths solid as science, for nobler objects and modes of life, for a freer and purer condition of human society. With all its excellencies and past services, the Christian Church has lamentably failed to satisfy these aspirations of mankind; and the time has come for the people to take their own highest concerns into their own hands. Priests are getting out of date, and so are clergymen, as expounders of a dogmatic system. Men insist to-day on thinking and speaking for themselves, and are no longer content to listen passively to authoritative teachers. "Lords" and "leaders" are at a heavy discount in America, and freedom is at par.

Now these Radical Clubs, starting up spontaneously in different places, and sure to multiply rapidly in the future, are organizations exactly adapted to the temper of the times. They are thoroughly democratic and uneclesiastical. If composed of earnest and intelligent people, they will accomplish incalculable good. We wish to offer a few practical hints on this subject.

HALF A DOZEN earnest and determined radicals are enough to start a Radical Club in any town. There need not be any expense involved, though of course money would be necessary to do all that might be done. Weekly meetings could be held at private houses. Let the members take turns in writing a short essay as the topic of a free discussion. Wherever there are five or six persons intelligent and interested enough to do this for any length of time, the Club will grow, and richly reward the members by the greater clearness of their convictions and the general enlargement of their culture.

The value of the Club, however, will be immensely enhanced, if a larger number unite to furnish a reading-room with liberal periodicals and books. Radicals do not read enough. They are too often shamefully ignorant on subjects that ought to enlist their strongest interest. A little library of first-class liberal literature (not the crude, prejudiced, bigoted stuff, full of false statements and half-truths, which is too often honored with that name) would be a public blessing to every town, and do it more real good than all the churches in it put together. Town libraries, which too often are controlled by Evangelical directors, will seldom admit liberal publications; and private individuals too often cannot afford to buy them. But a Radical Club, by combining the resources of many individuals, can purchase excellent works which shall give the real results of modern scholarship and educated thought. Every town of five thousand people, or even less, must to-day contain enough radicals to support a small but good library specially devoted to works of this class.

It will be still better if, besides the private meetings and reading-room, public discussions can be held in a hall free to all persons alike, or an occasional lecture secured from liberal speakers. Discussions well sustained by the people themselves, especially if based on previous reading by the participants, will be worth more than any lectures. Let living questions be proposed and earnestly debated. The following are a few of the subjects which have been discussed in the Toledo Radical Club with much profit to all concerned:—

What is Christianity?

What is Religion?

What is the Relation of Christianity to Free Religion?

The Immortality of the Soul.

Corporal Punishment in Families and Schools.

Has the Christian Church or the Community outgrown the Spirit of Persecution?

What should be our National Policy towards the Indians?

Should Radicals organize for the spread of Liberal Ideas?

Is Conscience the Result of Education?

Is Man in his Organization Progressive?

Is the Plan of Co-operative House-keeping a feasible one?

Ought the Bible to be Excluded from the Public Schools?

Such discussions will vary in interest, of course, and much will depend on the determination of all the members to do their part. Judging, however, from those held in this city, we think that no person can attend and participate regularly without deriving more or less solid benefit. This has certainly been our individual experience.

But, after all, the chief good to be accomplished by Radical Clubs must be a public one. They cannot fail to exert a healthy and bracing influence in the community. They can be made a powerful agency in the education of public opinion. The only means by which the public mind can ever be liberalized is agitation. There are many questions, like that of the Bible in the schools, which need to be agitated,—many reforms which need to be urged in every locality,—many evils which ought to be boldly and publicly protested against, as the first step to their removal. By their flexible character, these free associations of individuals can undertake and carry many important measures, if only inspired by a resolute and earnest spirit. The simple fact of their existence will do much to embolden the timid to assert their individuality, to break the bondage of a false public opinion, and thus to achieve a higher personal character. Radicalism needs the enthusiasm of a crusade for the liberation of human minds and hearts from a real slavery, visible enough to those who have themselves escaped out of it. Indifferentism is selfishness. Apathy is a vice. So indissolubly linked are we all by the ties of our humanity, that no man can be wholly free while a single serf is left on the face of the globe. The breath of a single slave poisons the whole earth's atmosphere for the lungs of freemen. Whoever beholds a brother in bondage unmoved by pity and indignation is himself the most degraded of all slaves,—the slave of selfishness. It is because Radical Clubs, being equally adapted for discussion and action, are a two-edged sword in the war of spiritual emancipation, that we hope to see them multiply throughout the length and breadth of the land.

CATHOLICISM VERSUS THE COMMON SCHOOLS.

In another column we print an extract from the Catholic World, the leading organ of Romanism in this country. In our address at the Park Meeting on "The Bible in the Schools," published in THE INDEX, No. 31, we said that the Catholics were hostile to our whole system of free schools, and sought to destroy it by dividing the school-funds. This statement has seemed harsh to some; but our extract from the Catholic World proves it to be true. We are aware that there are Catholics who approve the free school system, and will be content if it can be made entirely unsectarian. For instance, the following:—

THE BIBLE IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Rev. Dr. McGlynn, a liberal Catholic priest, who succeeded Dr. Cummings at St. Stephen's in New York, said he did not believe that religion and arithmetic should be taught by the same person. He believes that our public schools are one of the chief glories of America, and that they should be made institutions where Christians and Infidels, Jews and Gentiles, may alike send their children without their being insulted by any book or prayer or hymn that is to them a badge of the ascendancy of a sect, and without fear of any sectarian bias whatever.

Such Catholics as Dr. McGlynn, however, are utterly inconsistent in their position, and will prove to be practically as powerless as Father Hyacinthe to modify the Catholic policy, simply because they are liberal. The Pope's infallibility is now an authoritative dogma of the Roman Church, and must be accepted by all good Catholics; yet the Pope in his well-known "Syllabus," has, as we proved by citations, denounced "liberal Catholic" views on the school question as damnable errors. If the Church submits to the Pope's infallibility after this very denunciation, is any one simple enough to suppose it will afterwards rebel on account of it? The only course for "liberal Catholics" will be to submit or leave the Church. They are not Catholics at all, so long as they resist; and it is preposterous to call them so. No—the Roman Catholic Church is unequivocally committed against our school system; and no student of history will ever despise its power.

By the way, it is enough to make one rub his eyes in amazement to read the following statement, which according to the New York Times was recently made in that city by another Catholic priest, Rev. Thomas Preston:—

"In reference to education the Holy Father in the 'Syllabus' declared that all schools, even ecclesiastical seminaries, should be subjected to the complete control of the civil authorities, so as to accord with the ideas of the rulers of the State and the standard of opinion adopted by them." Nevertheless, education should not be separated from religion, and parents and pastors were responsible before God if the religious education of the child was neglected."

The reverend Father ought to cover his shaven crown with a cap-and-bells; for the "Syllabus," which he gravely quotes as the Pope's own declaration, is the list of heresies which the Pope denounces!—His only escape from the charge of incredible stupidity would be to plead an intention of deceiving the American people into belief of the Pope's liberality. But we give him the benefit of the first horn of the dilemma.

The first four numbers of the New York National Standard, lately the National Anti-Slavery Standard, are of the same high quality that marked this honestest of journals before the Anti-Slavery in its name became an anachronism. It gives us unfeigned pleasure to learn that its old friends still stand by it, and that its subscription list is still increasing. Through its columns Wendell Phillips will continue to speak to a nation that might have saved its own back from the knout of retribution by heeding his words betimes. The other familiar and veteran workers for reform will also contribute to its pages; and there is still need of their utmost efforts. Not till the Golden Age is realized in human experience will the necessity for such a sheet be past.

As we suspected, the Toledo Commercial's "liberality of practice" is equal to its zeal for "free discussion;" and both are equal to zero. It ejects a mass of irrelevant verbiage and, like the cuttle-fish, runs off in a cloud of its own ink. But we do not wonder at its course. It would be expecting too much of the Commercial's human nature, even after its ostentatious professions, to suppose it would convict itself of gross misrepresentation in the eyes of its own subscribers by copying our note.

The death of Admiral Farragut is a cause of sincere sorrow to every patriotic heart. Of all the heroes of the great civil war, none leaves a purer fame than he to the custody of his countrymen. A brave old man, grandly true to America in the face of all dangers and seductions! Peace to his ashes and fadeless glory to his name!

A WORD FOR REV. J. D. FULTON.

MINNBURN, IOWA, Aug. 7, 1870.

My Excellent Friend,—I am moved to say a few words through the columns of THE INDEX, if I may have the room, in defence of this Rev. Fulton, whose late bull against Dickens has so stirred the members of even his own household, and given newspaper men here and there the "indignation fever."

Of what crime has this Boston Dipper been guilty, that he should be snubbed in the council, peppered in the pulpit, and made the butt of such dainty-fingered conservatism as that of the Springfield Republican, a newspaper that was never guilty, in all its prosperous years, of uttering an opinion unless it was popular beyond a peradventure. What has this man said of Charles Dickens that has not been said, and proclaimed, and shouted to the ears, and written to the eyes of all men since Calvin's time who have not believed "the doctrines?" And why should not this Rev. Fulton send the author and poet and philanthropist to perdition without hope, when his religion teaches and has always taught that human virtues were but filthy rags, utterly powerless in the absence of "the faith" to save from the wrath to come? What has come over New England orthodoxy of the Baptist persuasion, that it drifts so weakly into the current of popular feeling, and allows the "right bower" of its creed to be pitched overboard by a popular enthusiasm? If Fulton is wrong,—if the fate he has apportioned to Dickens is a bit of malice, a slip of the fanatical tongue,—then the orthodox religion of this and other centuries is a lie, an imposition, an insult to sense, and a libel upon God. But if Fulton was consistent (and he was to the letter), then the Rev. Murdock & Co. who assailed him, and the Evangelical journals which join the hue and cry, are guilty of the meanest hypocrisy—have forsaken their ancient faith at the summons of the flesh. Keeping their brimstone for the poor, the lowly, the brothers and sisters who are not in the fashion, the reformer and philanthropist who have no following, they give the wink of absolution to genius, though it spends half its powers in holding them up to scorn and contempt.

I have not for a moment suspected that the clear-sighted editor of THE INDEX would fall into this trap. The warfare of true Radicalism is against the institutions that make these Fultons and Murdocks and their allies; with their consistency it has no quarrel, but rather it has respect and hope for the future of a man who dares to assert what he believes, though never so wrong. Honest earnestness is the salt of opinion, and will lead men sooner or later into all truth.

The name of Dickens is an honored name, and will be while our tongue is spoken; and that a company of intelligent men from any class should feel disturbed at the idea of his eternal damnation is natural enough, and a credit to their good sense. But their action in this case is a terrible commentary upon their religion; and while they should be rebuked for their recency, the friends of progress may see in it one of the "signs of the times."

[The above noble and just defence of Mr. Fulton's consistency was written by "a prophet and the son of a prophet;" and if we could append his name, which is modestly withheld, many an "old abolitionist" would rejoice to see it still the synonyme of chivalrous sentiment and love of justice. For some weeks we have intended to say a word in behalf of Mr. Fulton's fidelity to the premises of his creed, at a time when it makes him widely unpopular. It is true we are not a special admirer of this Baptist Boanerges, and we suspect he rather enjoys the notoriety even of abuse; but we nevertheless meant to protest against the meanness and cowardice with which his Baptist co-religionists shirk the logic of their own professions, and we now consign our half-written editorial to the waste-basket only because our work has been better done.

"Warrington," however, whose piquant and caustic article we reprinted because we like to enjoy a good thing with our readers, would undoubtedly coincide with the sentiment of the above article. He really meant to satirize the creed itself, by showing what bottomless abysses of absurdity it plunges its adherents into.—ED.]

WHERE IS CHARLES DICKENS?

And the same question may be asked in regard to Franklin, Jefferson, Thomas Paine, and the whole host of the world's reformers whose selfishness was not so great as to endeavor (Christian-like) to drag themselves into Abraham's bosom regardless of suffering humanity around them.

"In Hell!"—the pulpit answers; which answer is truly edifying to those who have been benefited by the dissemination of light and knowledge for which we are indebted to these true heroes of our race,—to say nothing of the aid rendered by them in establishing the rights of man and the intellectual freedom which we enjoy to-day.

Now that the great Dickens is dead, Orthodox Christians denounce him from pulpit and rostrum. And in this manner only can some of these bigots succeed in clambering into notice by vainly striving to rob these noble dead of the laurels they have so richly earned. They would bite the hand that gave them to drink from the intellectual fountains from which they have derived almost all they ever knew of what is really and truly great and good.

In the city of Boston, one of these defamers has recently made the awkward discovery of the actual truth of the matter,—namely, that he must either prove that Mr. Dickens is in hell-fire, or else that there is no truth in the Christian religion. Be it so; we heartily accept the latter alternative, and believe the world will be truly thankful to the Rev. J. D. Fulton for his discovery. And yet there is no good and true man or woman but would choose the companionship of such men as Dickens, either here or hereafter, in preference to that of his condemners. Mr. Fulton should not forget that a man's usefulness in this life does not depend on what or how much he professes to believe, but on what he has done for the benefit of his race. Never in this world's history has faith in a creed elevated any one man above his fellow; otherwise the ideal man would be found in the dark ages. And who dares to deny that it was unbelief that has brought men up out of that gloomy period of the supremacy of Christianity? Now, like sharks in the track of a vessel, these bigots follow in the wake of civilization, and pick up the scraps that fall from the rich stores of science and "infidelity."

We know that man's truest heaven and happiness consist in the elevation of his fellow-man, regardless of all clap-trap theories of atonement and forgiveness of sin, according to which the most degraded wretch that ever escaped unhung has only to ask God for an eternity of happiness, and it is granted forthwith; while, if an honest man were only to ask him for a bushel of potatoes to keep his family from starvation, they would all starve together. Let a "believer" pick pockets, steal a horse, or cut his brother's throat, and—

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Emmanuel's veins;
And sinners, plunged beneath the flood,
Loose all their guilty stains."

But the true benefactors of our race,—a Galileo, a Voltaire, a Gibbon, a Franklin, a Paine, or a Dickens, must suffer eternal damnation in the world to come, simply because they had no fear of a halter to drive them into repentance before they departed this life.

We have no doubt but that there are many old babies in the land who need some nursery tale to frighten them into proper subjection to the laws. To all such we would say,—"Be ye steadfast in the faith."

A FRIENDLY WORD TO DR. CLARKE.

REV. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE:

Dear Sir:—In your book entitled "Steps of Belief, or Rational Christianity maintained against Atheism, Free Religion, and Romanism,"—you say:

"One of these days we shall have a mind-cure, and then we shall send sick people to establishments where the body will be cured by well-arranged and properly administered mental stimulants and mental food. People will be talked into health, sung into health; and the wise physician, instead of potions and pills, will prescribe great thoughts and beautiful ideas."

Yes, Mr. Clarke, this sentence expresses a "great thought and a beautiful idea," and I hope that the time of its realization may come soon! But apply it to theology. One of these days there will be a belief purified from dogmatic assumptions and speculations, and the wise theologian, instead of preaching dogmas and misty doctrines, will give us great thoughts and beautiful ideas. Then Free Religion and universal Liberty will be developed. I find that you do your best to free Religion from certain dogmas. Keep on! and you will land at last on the beautiful shore of Free Religion, the culmination of Protestantism and all other crude religious beliefs!

Yours very respectfully,
CARL H. HORSCH.

SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Aug. 12, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ., ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I enclose for publication, if you see proper, an article on the old and oft-debated problem of "Spontaneous Generation" from the London Lancet, a medical publication, as you are doubtless aware, of high reputation and ability, with decided conservative tendencies. As therein stated, the methods and results of the experiments pursued by Dr. Bastian are given at length in Nature. As Darwin by experimentation has rendered "Natural Selection" highly probable, thus showing how natural agencies alone may account for the earth's past and present flora and fauna; as the revelations of the spectroscopic and the laws of motion have established a strong likelihood of the nebular origin of the solar system; as Fresnel, Young, Tyndall, and other co-workers, have shown that the laws of light are inconsistent with any other than the undulatory theory; as Grove, Helmholtz, Joule, and others, have shown the correlation and conservation of the physical forces; so the "vitalists" have received a death-blow at the hands of Bastian. Is not this a grand consummation? What a flood of light is by the profound and brilliant researches of this experimental philosopher thrown upon the science of biology!

When even beyond dispute a single instance can be shown of the evolution of vitality by the ordinary, every-day physical forces acting upon matter, will not sensible and unprejudiced thinkers throw to the winds all hypothetical, supra-mundane agencies in accounting for life? I think so.

The theory that life is something sui generis, something entirely dissociated and unrelated with the known forces of the universe, a so-called spiritual entity, is of very low genealogy; born in a period of profound ignorance, belonging to a class of uncivilized conceptions long since abandoned by scientific minds, it has not a single fact to rest upon.

On the other hand, the doctrine that life is the result of the "molecular forces of the organism displaying it," is admitted by the first Biologists of the day as having strong probability in its favor; and the experiments of Bastian, should they be verified by other competent observers, of which from their simplicity and thoroughness there can scarcely be a doubt, will justify the deduction, and thus establish the grand fact that life, like electricity, magnetism and chemical affinity, is a natural force, and, like the other natural forces, convertible into other forces when the conditions are favorable; and as all natural forces are convertible, though indestructible, what becomes of the theological dream of an individualized immortal soul?

Very respectfully,

INQUIRER.

THE CONFLICT OF IDEAS IN BOSTON.

The New Covenant, of Chicago, having called attention to the illiberality displayed by the Young Men's Christian Association, in causing the alleged arrest of a Unitarian clergyman for distributing liberal tracts at the entrance to Tremont Temple, in which their rooms are located, the Boston Congregationalist denies the grave allegation, and calls upon the New Covenant to retract its unfavorable criticism.

With this demand, Mr. Hatch, the clergyman referred to, thinks the New Covenant ought not to comply; since the officers of the "Y. M. C. A." did, he says, repeatedly and persistently solicit his arrest, which was as persistently refused by the authorities. What has worried and distressed the Evangelicals still more, the authorities gave Mr. Hatch permission to deliver a series of liberal discourses on the Common on Sunday evenings. The fourth of this series was delivered Sunday evening before last to a larger audience than the "Y. M. C. A." succeeded in calling together in the same place an hour or two earlier.

As they have had the field altogether to themselves on the Common until now, they feel aggrieved, and look upon Mr. H. in the light of a poacher upon their preserves. But there is no help for it, the old elm (still standing) on which the Quakers were hung being now happily out of use in that way.

HEATHEN AND CHRISTIAN.

STOCKHOLM, N. Y., August 18, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—If any Christian Missionary from our country, or from any Christian country to any heathen country, has ever delivered to them as good and as true a discourse as the sermon of the India missionary, Brother Sen, in the last INDEX, I have not seen it in print. Though, with you, I have renounced the name, I desire, for the honor of Christianity, that, if there be any such, it might be printed. Is it not possible for a Christian to be as liberal as that "heathen"? For some years I have declared that I could get no evidence that, on the whole, we were on a higher plane in our religion than those we have spent millions of money, and sacrificed many lives, to convert. In some things they and their books are wiser than we and our books.

Yours,
AUSTIN KENT.

THE MIRACULOUS CONCEPTION.

A certain preacher of my acquaintance of "the Church of Jesus Christ," or what he assumes to be such, in a sermon lately published, remarks upon his text—"As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God"—as follows:

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God—not one more. But still the question is to be settled, how does the Spirit lead men? I will attempt the settlement of this question by a direct appeal to the Holy Scriptures, premising only that, if we can clearly ascertain how one person was led by the Spirit of God, we can know how every other person was and is led by the Spirit of God; if we can ascertain how one grain of corn is produced, we can then know how every other grain of corn is produced; if we can know how one spire of grass is produced, we can know how every other spire of grass is produced. All that is necessary is to multiply the means for the production ad infinitum, &c." Now, Mr. Abbot, this is a pretty clear statement of a position; and, in view of it, may I not pertinently ask—If we know how one child of flesh is begotten, conceived and born, may we not know how every other such child was and is begotten, conceived and born? And if what my friend says is the truth with regard to one natural production, may we not assume that it is alike so of all others, including man? Certainly the natural man is not less a natural production than any other! Nevertheless I hold it as true that a man may be begotten of God without the intervention of man; but he cannot be born of woman without such intervention. If this, then, be incontrovertibly true, and it doubtless is so, what must be the fate of the miraculous conception story as a historic fact? It ever was, and ever will remain, a truth that flesh begets flesh, and spirit begets spirit. So saith the word, so saith nature, and so saith the spirit of both.

Truly yours,
K. N.

Selections.

A TRANCE SPEAKER OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

[From the first chapter of "Theobald, or the Fanatic. A True History," by Heinrich Stilling, Aulic Counsellor to the Grand Duke of Baden.]

There is one other remarkable person whom I must not omit to notice, whose influence on the people was exceedingly great, and still continues; I mean the well-known John Frederick Rock. He was a common, uneducated, but a very pious and devoted man, and a shoemaker by trade. He lived according to the best of my knowledge in Baden, at Isenberg, and supported his family in a respectable manner. The mystical and pietistic writings which were now poured profusely into the hands of the common people, were read by Rock with uncommon diligence and attention, and wrought in him a strong purpose to lead a new life. By his frequent exercises of devotion, and other zealous labors, he became more and more ardent on the subject of religion, until the fire of enthusiasm rose to such intensity, that he fell into paroxysms of a most singular nature. He was generally unconscious, and had a sort of mild, easy spasms, in which state he usually spoke with such fluency of language, and energy of voice and manner, that he surpassed even the eloquence of Hochman. When he came to himself, he did not know a single word of what he had spoken. The fact is certain, for in my youth he preached through the whole extent of my native country, and what I say I can easily substantiate. His preaching was tolerably connected in thought, and wholly in the style of the Bible prophets. When the paroxysms commenced, his countenance assumed a grave and solemn appearance, and raising his right hand, he exclaimed, "Thus saith the Lord, or, the Lord saith by his servant Rock." All his sermons in this state were on the subjects of repentance and conversion, according to the views of the mystics, though occasionally he reproved and threatened the declining clergy, and warned them of the approaching judgment. The common people and many intelligent persons were in utter amazement at this new and wonderful preacher. Their shallow acquaintance with the nature of mind, and their inability to explain the matter on natural principles, led them to regard him as an ambassador from God, and the more especially as he was a man of pre-eminent piety, and never uttered anything in his sermons inconsistent with the doctrines of the Bible.

Rock first made his appearance in his own neighborhood, but he soon felt an impulse to visit other places, for he now considered himself a teacher sent from God. A neighboring nobleman took his family in charge, and Rock did nothing but journey and preach. The concourse of people was immense. Certain persons among them thought it their duty to take down his discourses as he delivered them, and travelled with him for the purpose as his attendants. A large number of these sermons were published, and a still larger number were scattered in every direction in writing. I myself have seen bundles of them. His written sermons were known by his own signature, F. R. In every place where he preached, he made many disciples, who are still known by the name of the inspired. They were rigid separatists, rejecting the ordinances of the Lord's supper and baptism. They sang in their assemblies, prayed and read, and then waited, like the English Quakers, for a divine impulse to speak. In other respects they were quiet, irreproachable, pious, and excellent people.

At length Rock, accompanied by a retinue of his followers, came into the principality of Nassau-Siegen. As the country was populous, and manufactures and trade and good schools were common, the people had attained to a high degree of intelligence and prosperity. On these accounts, both good and bad enthusiasm met with a ready reception. Hochman and Dippel had both labored here, and the writings of the mystics were read by the mass of the population. Opposition to the clergy, and to the established church, had likewise risen to its height, and Rock was received as an angel from heaven, or as some great apostle. He continued to labor a long time in those parts, and had designed to visit his friends at Berlinberg and Schwartzenu. There lived in Siegen, upon the plantation of a nobleman, a certain French refugee by the name of De Marsay; he had purchased the property, and paid occasional visits to Berlinberg, when he retired again to his solitude. This gentleman had been a pupil of Madame Guyon: he had known her well, and enjoyed much of her society. He was a man of great excellence, both as to disposition and talents, and was loved and respected by every one. With the fervid gravity of the pietists, he united an uncommon degree of affability, benevolence, and charity for the principles and opinions of others,—virtues which were rarely found among this class of people. He had written a work entitled The Testimony of a Child to the Righteousness of the Ways of the Spirit, in the volumes of which he undertakes to show that all the fixed stars are so many mansions in the house of the Father, and each star, or collection of stars, with its inhabitants is a kingdom, which would be committed to the authority and rule of true Christians after death. Had De Marsay presented these views as a beautiful hypothesis, and not as a divinely authorized truth, the subject might be worthy of reflection! In all other respects he agreed perfectly with the principles of the mystics.

Rock, attended with a retinue of his followers, paid this distinguished man a visit. Multitudes flocked to the house of De Marsay from all the surrounding neighborhood. But De Marsay understood the nature of the thing much better than any of them, and informed some of the people that Rock's preaching was in itself excellent and edifying, but that they might depend on it there was nothing supernatural in the matter, and on that account he judged it highly improper that honest people should be deceived by the false spirit under which Rock spoke; he further stated that he himself would convince them of the truth. Every one had his attention highly excited, and felt an extreme anxiety for the result. Soon he perceived the approach of the paroxysm. The people were all assembled in a large hall, where Rock and his scribes were sitting; De Marsay took a seat near him, and, just as he was in the midst of his discourse, took up a pail of water that he had in readiness, and threw it over him. Rock, struck with surprise and astonishment, came to himself, and from that time onward he had no more paroxysms, and discontinued his preaching. De Marsay then remonstrated with Rock and his followers, and showed them in a convincing manner that the Spirit of God could not be quenched by a pail of water, and at the same time urged it upon them as a duty to employ regular and rational means for the attainment of divine knowledge.

Rock received the admonition kindly, returned home, and continued in future his exhortations in a state of consciousness. He occasionally visited his disciples, some of whom altogether denied the truth of the preceding affair, while others took it ill of De Marsay that he should have treated Rock in that manner.

SCIENCE OF RELIGION.

One of the objects of the Free Religious Association, according to its Constitution, is "to encourage the scientific study of theology." This clause, as we happen to know, was put into the Constitution advisedly, and was deemed important by the Committee who framed the articles. Its import, however, will be better understood, we think, in the future than it has been in the past. It will be remembered by persons who were present at the meeting when the Association was organized, that the venerable Lucretia Mott, while giving her most cordial endorsement to the general aims of the Association and her gracious benediction to the movement, made some objection to the insertion of this clause. She with her Quaker views, as she said, could not believe in the "study of theology" at all. And she feared, too, that if this object were made prominent, the Association would become speculative to the detriment of its practical work. Others have felt, more or less, the same objection.

For our own part, so far as this criticism (and it comes from some of the best friends and members of the Association) is intended to guard the Association against becoming a merely speculative body, we have sympathized with it. But we have always thought that it rested on a misconception of what was meant to be implied by the clause in question. Very naturally the first thought that occurred to Mrs. Mott on hearing the words was of the formal study of theology and training for the ministry in "Divinity Schools." And other objectors have had in mind that kind of "study of theology" which has rather confused and obscured than helped people's ideas of religion. But the "study of theology," as usually pursued in "Divinity Schools" and elsewhere under ecclesiastical auspices, is anything but scientific. It is partisan and dogmatic. It begins with certain assumed results, towards which the student's efforts are constantly directed and at which he must finally arrive. There is nothing in this method that is worthy of the name of science. Science is free,—free to examine all the facts and to apply the principles of reason everywhere. Even Mrs. Mott, with her grand Quaker doctrine of the "Inner Light," does not object to this free application of reason to religious history and religious conceptions. She has always made the application in her own teaching. And this method, availing itself of all the advantages of modern research and scholarship, is, as we understand, what is meant by the "scientific study of theology." Of course a true conception of religion and a true view of religious history do not necessarily imply the practice of religion: and the practice is always the most important. Yet if truth of conception is ever of any worth toward the education and progress of mankind, it must be of worth in the development of man's moral and spiritual nature, which is the field of religion.

We have made these remarks not so much for their own importance as preliminary to some extracts from Max Mueller's first lecture of a course delivered in London last spring on the "Science of Religion." These passages will serve, we think, to explain what the Free Religious Association means by a "scientific study of theology." Possibly they contain some concessions to Christian prejudice, but they indicate the significance and breadth of the phrase, "Science of Religion."

In these our days it is almost impossible to speak of religion without giving offence either on the right or on the left. With some, religion seems too sacred a subject for scientific treatment: with others it stands on a level with alchemy and astrology, a mere tissue of errors or hallucinations, far beneath the notice of the man of science. In a certain sense, I accept both these views. Religion is a sacred subject, and whether in its most perfect or in its most imperfect form, it has a right to our highest reverence. No one—this I can promise—who attends these lectures, be he Christian or Jew, Hindu or Mohammedan, shall hear his own way of serving God spoken of irreverently. But true reverence does not consist in declaring a subject, because it is dear to us, to be unfit for free and honest inquiry; far from it! True reverence is shown in treating every subject, however sacred, however dear to us, with perfect confidence; without fear and without favor; with tenderness and love, by all means, but, before all, with an unflinching and uncompromising loyalty to truth. I also admit that religion has stood in former ages, and stands even in our own age, if we look abroad, aye, even if we look into some dark places at home, on a level with alchemy and astrology; but for the discovery of truth there is nothing so useful as the study of errors, and we know that in alchemy there lay the seed of chemistry, and that astrology was more or less a yearning and groping after the true science of astronomy.

But although I shall be most careful to avoid giving offence, I know perfectly well that many a statement I shall have to make, and many an opinion I shall have to express, will sound strange and startling to some of my hearers. The very title of the Science of Religion jars on the ears of many persons, and a comparison of all the religions of the world, in which none can claim a privileged position, must seem to many reprehensible in itself, because ignoring that peculiar reverence which everybody, down to the mere fetish-worshipper, feels for his own religion and for his own God. Let me say then at once that I myself have shared these misgivings, but that I have tried to overcome them, because I would not and could not allow myself to surrender either what I hold to be the truth, or what I hold still dearer than the truth, the right tests of truth. Nor do I regret it. I do not say that the Science of Religion is all gain. No, it entails losses, and losses of many things which we hold dear. But this I will say, that, as far as my humble judgment goes, it does not entail the loss of anything that is essential to true religion, and that if we strike the balance honestly, the gain is immeasurably greater than the loss.

People ask, What is gained by comparison?—Why, all higher knowledge is gained by comparison, and rests on comparison. If it is said that the character of scientific research in our age is pre-eminently comparative; this really means that our researches are now based on the widest evidence that can be obtained, on the broadest inductions that can be grasped by the human mind? What can be gained by comparison?—Why, look at the study of languages. If you go back but a hundred years and examine the folios of the most learned writers on questions connected with language, and then open a book written by the merest tyro in Comparative Philology, you will see what can be gained, what has been gained, by the comparative method. A few hundred years ago, the idea that Hebrew was the original language of mankind was accepted as a matter of course, even as a matter of faith, the only problem being to find out by what process Greek or Latin, or any other language could have been developed out of Hebrew. The idea, too, that language was revealed, in the scholastic sense of that word, was generally accepted, although as early as the fourth century, St. Gregory, the learned bishop of Nyssa, had strongly protested against it. The grammatical framework of a language was either considered as the result of a conventional agreement, or the termination of nouns and verbs were supposed to have sprouted forth like buds from the roots and stems of language; and the vaguest similarity in the sound and meaning of words was taken to be a sufficient criterion for testing their origin and their relationship. Of all this philological somnambulism we hardly find a trace in works published since the days of Humboldt, Bopp, and Grimm. Has there been any loss here? Has it not been pure gain? Does language excite admiration less, because we know that, though the faculty of speaking is the work of him who has so framed our nature, the invention of words for naming each object was left to man, and was achieved through the working of the human mind? Is Hebrew less carefully studied, because it is no longer believed to be a revealed language sent down from heaven, but a language closely allied to Arabic, Syriac and ancient Babylonian, and receiving light from these cognate, and in some respects more primitive, languages, for the explanation of many of its grammatical forms, and for the exact interpretation of many of its obscure and difficult words? Is the grammatical articulation of Greek and Latin less instructive because, instead of seeing in the termination of nouns and verbs merely arbitrary signs to distinguish the singular from the plural, or the present from the future, we can now perceive an intelligible principle in the gradual production of formal out of the material elements of language? And are our etymologies less important, because, instead of being suggested by superficial similarities, they are now based on honest historical and physiological research? Lastly, has our own language ceased to hold its own peculiar place? Is our love for our own native tongue at all impaired? Do men speak less boldly or pray less fervently in their own mother tongue, because they know its true origin and its undorned history; or because they have discovered that in all languages, even in the jargons of the lowest savages, there is order and wisdom; there is in them something that makes the world akin?

Why then, should we hesitate to apply the comparative method, which has produced such great results in other spheres of knowledge, to a study of religion? That it will change many of the views commonly held about the origin, the character, the growth, and decay of the religions of the world, I do not deny; but unless we hold that fearless progression in new inquiries, which is our bounden duty and our honest pride in all other branches of knowledge, is dangerous in the study of religions, unless we allow ourselves to be frightened by the once famous dictum, that whatever is new in theology is false, this ought to be the very reason why a comparative study of religions should no longer be neglected or delayed.

It will easily be perceived that religion means at least two very different things. When we speak of the Jewish, or the Christian, or the Hindu religion, we mean a body of doctrines handed down by tradition, or in canonical books, and containing all that constitutes the faith of Jew, Christian or Hindu. Using religion in that sense, we may say that a man has changed his religion, that is, that he has adopted the Christian instead of the Brahmanical body of religious doctrines, just as a man may learn to speak English instead of Hindustani. But religion is also used in a different sense. As there is a faculty of speech, independent of all the historical forms of language, so we may speak of a faculty of faith in man, independent of all historical religions. If we say that it is religion which distinguishes man from the animal, we do not mean any special religion, but we mean a mental faculty, that faculty which, independent of, nay in spite of sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the Infinite under varying disguises. Without that faculty, no religion, not even the lowest worship of idols and fetishes, would be possible; and if we will but listen attentively, we can hear in all religions a groaning of the spirit, a struggle to conceive the inconceivable, to utter the unutterable, a longing after the Infinite, a love of God. Whether the etymology which the ancients gave of the Greek word anthropos, man, be true or not, (they derived it from ho anō, athron, he who looks upward): certain it is that what makes man to be man, is that he alone can turn his face to heaven; certain it is that he alone yearns for something that neither sense nor reason can supply.

If then there is a philosophical discipline which examines into the conditions of sensuous perception, and if there is another philosophical discipline which examines into the conditions of rational conception, there is clearly a place for a third philosophical discipline that has to examine into the conditions of that third faculty of man, co-ordinate with sense and reason, the faculty of perceiving the Infinite, which is at the root of all religions. In German we can distinguish that third faculty by the name of Vernunft, as opposed to Verstand, reason and Sinne, sense. In English I know no better name for it, than the faculty of faith, though it will have to be guarded by careful definition, and to be restricted to those objects only which cannot be supplied either by the evidence of the senses, or by the evidence of reason. No simply historical fact can ever fall under the cognizance of faith.

With all the genuine documents for studying the history of the religions of mankind that have lately been brought to light, and with the great facilities which a more extensive study of Oriental languages has afforded to scholars at large for investigating the deepest springs of religious thought all over the world, a comparative study of religions has become a necessity. A science of religion, based on a comparison of all, or at all events, of the most important religions of mankind, is now only a question of time. It is demanded by those whose voice cannot be disregarded. Its title, though implying as yet a promise rather than a fulfilment, has become more or less familiar in Germany, France, and America; its great problems have attracted the eyes of many inquirers, and its results have been anticipated either with fear or delight. It becomes the duty of those who have devoted their life to the study of the principal religions of the world in their original documents, and who value religion and reverence it in whatever form it may present itself, to take possession of this new territory in the name of true science, and thus to protect its sacred precincts from the inroads of mere babblers. Those who would use a comparative study of religions as a means for debasing Christianity by exalting the other religions of mankind, are to my mind as dangerous allies as those who think it necessary to debase all other religions in order to exalt Christianity. Science wants no partisans. I make no secret that true Christianity seems to me to become more and more exalted the more we appreciate the treasures of truth hidden in the despised religions of the world. But no one can honestly arrive at that conviction, unless he uses honestly the same measures for all religions. It would be fatal for any religion to claim an exceptional treatment, most of all for Christianity. Christianity enjoyed no privileges and claimed no immunities when it boldly confronted and confounded the most ancient and the most powerful religions of the world. Even at present it craves no mercy, and it receives no mercy from those whom our missionaries have to meet face to face in every part of the world; and unless our religion has ceased to be what it was, its defenders should not shrink from this new trial of strength, but should encourage rather than depreciate the study of comparative theology.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

CHAOS AND COSMOS.

[Read to the partially formed "Independent Society," Dover, N. H., Sept. 6, 1868, just after the summer vacation.]

"And the earth was without form and void: and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." GENESIS, I, 2.

Fresh from daily companionship with the boundless sea, the sheen of its billows still flashing before my eyes and the roar of its surf still echoing in my ears, I cannot forbear, my friends, to dwell this morning upon the thought which, above all others, has seemed to me the burden of that eternal and majestic monotone. While still lingering by the ocean's side, —whether watching the resistless rush of the breakers as they leap in foam and spray over the rocks, or roll in white sheets of froth up the smooth sands of the beach,—or whether gazing beyond the endless turmoil of the floods at my feet to the far horizon where heaven and earth seem to touch each other with a kiss of peace,—I find that thought is overpowered by the stupendous sublimity of Nature, and imagination is paralyzed by a feeling of unutterable awe. How idle would be the attempt to put pen to paper in presence of the ocean, or even to interpret in one's own mind the meanings of its mysterious language! Not until freed from the spell of its immediate presence, can we begin to comprehend its teachings. The senses are awake to sights and sounds; the mind cannot maintain its equipoise, or detect the significance of what is seen and heard, until the hour of quiet and undistracted thought arrives.

Yet in a confused manner, without any attempt to analyze the impressions of the moment, I was haunted by the consciousness of a perfect concord in that seeming discord of the waves; I felt the unity of law underlying that vast variety of motions, and realized in some sort the truth that, even in the heart of disorder itself, order—divine order—sits everlastingly enthroned. Upon the face of the waters still moves the "Spirit of God," continuing through the enormous cycles of eternity his work of perpetual creation, and evermore educating Cosmos out of CHAOS.

The old Hebrew bard, constructing his cosmogony according to the best knowledge of the times, made many a mistake in point of scientific fact; but, with the divine instinct of a poet, he seized on that verity of verities which was discerned in human hearts long before the birth of science,—the verity of a living God. It needs not the culture of the nineteenth century to discover this supreme truth; the untutored barbarian, musing beside the sea or gazing on the midnight heavens, is stirred in soul by influences which the wisest of mankind seek in vain to comprehend; and he, like them, bows in awe before the Great Mystery of the Universe. For him, as for them, the secret of existence is neither Fate nor Chance, but eternal Spirit, brooding over the tossing floods of Time: for him, as for them, disorder is but the matrix of order, and chaos but the mask of cosmos; for him, as for them, the whence, the why, and the whither, remain hidden in profoundest night.

Yet, for all this, I would not disparage the great privilege of living in days of comparative enlightenment. Where the barbarian can only suspect order, we can often see it; and though, even to science, chaos is not yet beheld as perfect cosmos, the unity of this universe is so far an established truth that the simple faith of the child is in substance identical with the highest wisdom of the philosopher. The more completely one the creation is proved to be, the more profoundly rational becomes our trust in One Creative Spirit; and, standing beside the ocean, where I know that the vast maze of seemingly lawless motions is obedient to intelligible law, my faith becomes intensified that, wherever disorder seems to reign, order is in reality supreme. Could we but see the whole in the part, and the end in the beginning,—could we but read the enigma of being in the light of its solution,—could we but apprehend the consciousness of God, and understand the equal perfectness of his ends and his means,—depend upon it, friends, our misgivings would seem almost too foolish to be pitied, and we should share the sublime patience of Eternal Wisdom with all that seems awry. All confusions would be harmonized, all antagonisms would be reconciled, all discords in the music of the spheres would be blended into a higher music still. The Spirit of God moves upon the face of the waters; and though darkness be upon the face of the deep, and though the earth be seemingly without form and void, yet I urge you to a higher faith than the ancient poet of creation knew,—the faith that chaos is itself cosmos, that all disorder is but order seen amiss.

This is the thought that comes to me in the solemn symphony of ocean's unending roar; and to me it seems the one thought that lifts us out of all gloomy doubts and soul-corroding despairs. To God chaos itself is cosmos; disorder is in fact but a name for unperceived order, as chance is but a name for unknown cause. Never in all the past was there a time when the universe was a "rude and undigested mass," never in all the future will there be a time when it will be a finished mechanism. Harmony, order, cosmos, consists in everlasting becoming, not in completed being; it consists in the perpetual unfolding and embodiment of an infinite thought in infinite time, a never-ending progression or march of creation which is at every step conformed to the perfect purpose of God. Nature is the visible expression of the Divine Life, co-eternal with that life itself; creation is not a spasm of energy succeeding an eternity of idleness, but rather the eternal energizing of an eternally active Spirit. The creation of the universe was indeed not the "creation of something out of nothing,"—dismiss that notion as the product of intellectual bewilderment. Nature is but another name for the orderly manifestation of infinite thought,—the Eternal Word of Eternal Spirit; and from everlasting to everlasting it is cosmos, and not chaos. The on-goings of this self-revelation are the gradual evolution of matter and of mind; and the unity, order, and beauty of the process show the immanent Power to be at once Person and more than Person. Thus Nature is read in the light of a high philosophy, and becomes one with God.

Perhaps you may say—"Confusion, disorder, chaos,—are not these real in human life? Or we not in life's experience know them to be other than illusions,—to be the grimmest of actualities? Pain, misfortune, poverty, grief, oppression,—shall we vote these to be dreams? Can we live as if they were such? Why torment human hearts with an exhortation to impossible patience with real evils? Make what you will of it, evil is evil, and nothing is gained by calling it good in disguise. You urge the duty of sincerity; why not practise it by calling things by their right names?"

There is a great deal of truth in this retort, if any of you should make it in your hearts. But it is not wholly fair, after all. I certainly call evil evil, and make no doubt that, as we see it, it is really such. But I raise this question merely—must it really be as we see it? There are times when I think so; but, I confess, I am not then my best self. There are other times when I can see even my own troubles in a higher light. Nothing is easier than to come here and call your misfortunes and griefs "blessings in disguise," but the test comes when I have to go home and call my own by that name. Sometimes I can do this, sometimes not. But I feel myself to be a wiser man when I can, than when I cannot. It certainly makes me stronger and more fixed in good purposes, if I can look at the seeming chaos of human life and say to myself,—"It is, after all, the cosmos of a perfect Providence of Law." Somehow or other if I can persuade myself not to give way before inevitable ills, but rather to greet them as honest friends somewhat gruff in voice, I always find them such in the end. At any rate, whining, moping, or complaining never made me any better than I was before. I do not pretend to call pain a good, except as it may be viewed by a higher than human wisdom; I do not pretend to enjoy the headache, or relish disasters, or make merry when I lose my friends. But whatever seems to me painful or sad or even cruel in the laws of Nature from which I know there is no escape, becomes more easy to bear, if I can honestly feel that, black as it looks to me, it is all white to God. I do not gain much by insisting that black to me must be black to him. An old minister of former times once went to see a grieving mother who had just lost her only child. She could not, she said, forgive God for taking her darling; in fact, she could not and she would not bear it. The minister listened to her almost frantic cries with patience, and tried to suggest consoling thoughts; but, when she repeated with bitter emphasis that she could not and would not bear it, he stopped short, and simply said,—"Madam, what do you propose to do about it?" A little bluntly put, perhaps, but a question we have all to face. For myself, I take great comfort in this thought that chaos to man is cosmos to God. The rough waves, dashing and tumbling in fierce confusion on the beach, swirling the sands about in little maelstroms, and with angry undertow sucking shells, pebbles, and kelp back into the tumult of the surf, seem to obey fixed laws as little as the surging catastrophes that sweep away human happiness on the shores of Time. Yet, dear friends, even here I believe that law is method, and that love is motive; and that in one case as truly as in the other, the Spirit of God moves upon the face of the waters.

But the principle which I urge this morning, that man's chaos is God's cosmos, is still more severely tested, when we come to apply it directly to the world of moral life. Our own feelings and thoughts, words and actions, tossing and rushing like the restless breakers, surely make confusion worse confounded,—a chaos more hopelessly bewildering than that of the waves. Further, if we are at all free, we must be to some extent uncontrolled by fixed laws. This I must admit, for to deny it seems to me the very negation of all morals. Free we must be in all moral choices. But here our freedom ends. Having made our choices, consequences pursue us by inexorable laws. And in these laws of moral reaction, of retribution for evil and of benediction for good, I certainly discern the moving of the Spirit of God upon the face of the waters. I believe that to God it appears a nobler thing to educate a free soul freely into virtue, than to create a moral automaton, a spiritual machine. Then it follows that, free-agency being bestowed, the sins of free agents cannot be prevented except by despotic interference with their moral freedom; and it seems a better thing on the whole that moral freedom with much sin and much virtue should exist, than that moral mechanism should exist without either. Thus I explain to myself the fact of sin under the laws of infinite Goodness. But out of this chaos of spiritual evil, which I admit I cannot even suppose to be actual cosmos, I believe that eventually a divine cosmos will be evolved. Over the ocean of human life moves ever the Creative Spirit; through the inner tempests it moves, stilling the storms and educing order out of the very riot of disorder. Every virtuous and holy soul is a creation, a spiritual cosmos, of the indwelling God. The breath of the Spirit is life itself, and creates noble character by conferring upon it the limited power of self-creation. Given the natural faculties with a certain liberty in their use, man becomes himself a creator of his own character under the fixed laws which determine his organization and circumstances. We can at will foster or furnish the good instincts of our being; we can to a certain extent welcome or reject the influences creative of spiritual excellence, and thus freely advance or retard the development of the cosmos of the soul.

A beautiful illustration of this self-created yet God-created cosmos in a human soul, as if to interpret and make clearer to me the lessons of the great deep, came to my notice during my stay at the sea-shore. To the boarding-house there came a gentle girl and her lover. A few days after, there came also an old man, infirm, poor, solitary, and not knowing a soul in the house. As soon as the young lady discovered these facts about the old man, she spoke to him with great kindness and respect, showed him every possible attention, and by her noble spirit won many others to be equally kind to the lonely stranger. I was greatly touched, when the old man came to take his leave, and with feeble steps tottered around to shake the hands of all who would notice him, to see that this young lady not only gave him her hand with the utmost cordiality, but touched his cheek with her lips, as if she were his daughter. Surely I never saw a more beautiful sight. Must I add that one of the boarders, utterly blind to the beauty and exceeding delicacy of her act, actually ventured afterwards to approach her with a foolish jest on what he called "her flirtation with the old man?" Cold and coarse, he meant no harm, but knew no better. Ah, if such thoughtful kindness as hers were more common in this world of ours, it would not be the spiritual chaos it so often appears!

It is the spirit of unselfish devotion to the good of all, the enthusiasm of self-consecration to a high ideal, that reveals the deeper unities of life, and brings glorious order out of its baffling and bewildering confusions. Even there law also rules; even there the immanent God moves over the face of the waters, and, as in the old Hebrew poem of the creation, fashions a new and harmonious and beautiful world. It is a privilege unspeakably magnificent that man should be himself a creator, and out of the chaos of his wild wants and wayward impulses educe at last the cosmos of a divine character.

NOT A FIT WOMAN FOR SUFFRAGE.—During the holidays, a few months back, I had occasion, in pursuit of Noah's arks and other juvenile requirements, to visit several toyshops. In one of these, as attendant and apparent proprietor, I found a woman, who was also a lady. She had been handsome, and was still young, but she looked dragged and careworn, as she well might, with a fat boy of ten months in her arms, a little girl of less than three years pulling at her dress, and an older girl of seven or eight doing her best to straighten out the articles disarranged by customers. I entered into conversation with her, and expressed my surprise at finding a woman of her apparent education and refinement in such a position. She told me that her husband was studying for a physician, that to support the family and enable him to do it, she had undertaken this toyshop, and she added, with great pride, "I have succeeded beyond my expectations. I do not intend he shall be ashamed of us, either," said she. "When spring comes on, I shall replace my toys with fancy goods and little garments of my own making, and I expect to make enough to set him up as a physician in a respectable quarter, and then when he is established we can join him, and no one will know anything about it." I said, "Do you think he will realize the sacrifices you are making for him?" She looked at me in simple wonder. She had not thought of sacrifices.—Exchange.

MARK TWAIN'S WICKED BOOK.

Deacon B. Criticises the "New Pilgrim's Progress."

BY RALPH.

[From the Springfield, Mass., Republican.]

Old Deacon B. had told me that "Mark Twain was an impious fellow who had spoken disrespectfully of the Holy Land."

"Where?" said I.

"Where?" replied he, "why, in that new miserable book of his'n, called the New Pilgrim's Progress. I was invaginated into buyin' that air book by a raskill pedler. He told me that the book was written by John Bunyan jest afore he died. The mannerscript, he said, had jest been discovered in the British Museum, and was goin' to be published, and I, like a 'tarnal fool, subscribed for it. He looked like an honest fellow, and I paid him four dollars in advance for it, but I never would have done it if he hadn't seemed such a pious young man, and he said he wanted the money. He told me he would bring the book around in a few days his self, but he didn't. The 'tarnal scoundrel cent it by mail. I was awful mad," said the deacon, "when I found out the wicked trick that had been played on me. I opened the book and found that it was written by a fellow who called himself Mark Twain. Agag Solomon David B.—that's my eldest son," said the deacon, "he said that Mark Twain wasn't the fellow's real name. It was Lemons, or Clemmons, or something like that. He, Lemons, or Clemmons, or whatever the critter's real name was, had cut up some dido out in California, or New Mexico. He didn't know whether 'twas for hoss stealin' or murder, 'twant for him to say. But one thing he did know certain; he had done something out of the way, else why did he change his name? I can tell you one thing," continued the deacon, "when you see one of those fellers that dastn't write under his own name, you can lay it down as a fact that he has done something bad, something that he is ashamed of."

I nodded my head approvingly, and the deacon proceeded. "When I found out what that awful book really was, I had a good mind to pitch it into the fire. Then, thinks I, I will take it over and show it to the minister. He said it was a vain book, and he did not know but what it was a wicked one; for says he, that Mark Twain has written against Sunday school books, and anybody that will do that must be of a very depraved heart."

"What did you do next?" said I.

"Well," said the deacon, "I took the cussed thing home and held it four or five times over the fire-place, but every time the flames shot up high I thought I could not afford to lose it, for it cost me four dollars in money. I thought I could sell it to somebody, or make the pedler take it back. So I laid it on the shelf where Agag Solomon David B. couldn't find it. It lay there for as much as a week; then the folks were all gone and I thought perhaps it was my duty to read that book and let the public know what it really was. Well, I read it all through in about ten days, and found that it was all about a trip on a steamboat made by a lot of wicked pleasure-seekers. The feller praises that infidel France and them nasty niggers which he tries to disguise under the name of our friends the Bermudians. But I can see through it all! He shows up the Catholics first-rate, and all their miserable lyin' frauds and tricks; this is the only good thing in the book. I think it's my duty to show those passages to the minister. On all other points he is very unreliable, and he does speak awfully about the Holy Land—says it ain't a land flowin' with milk and honey, right contrary to scripture. He ridicools books writ by ministers of the gospel. The feller better be careful what he is doin'." Here the deacon quoted scripture for thirty minutes. Contrary to all precedent, I shall not give his quotations entire. He quoted the whole of the first chapter of Genesis, fourth and fifth chapters of Deuteronomy, fourth and eighth verses of the first chapter of Numbers, and two entire chapters in Acts, which particular ones I have forgotten. The reader can select any two he has a mind to, and I have no doubt they will be as pertinent to the subject as any that the deacon quoted.

The deacon went on with his story saying, "The folks didn't come home as soon as I expected, there were some things that I had forgotten, and I thought it my duty to read the miserable book again, so as not to make any mistake when I wrote about it to the public. I had got it all read through but nine pages the second time, when I heard the folks drive up. I jest give it a sling, and it landed way up on top of the shelf, in the black cupboard. I laid four or five bundles of herbs over it, and then went out and helped the folks in. They had been up to Aunt Hanner's to see about some cider apple-sarse for winter, and Agag Solomon David B., he talked about buyin' a pair of steers, and my old woman was goin' tew get some—"

"Never mind your wife now," said I, interrupting him, "tell us more about the book."

"Well, it lay up there on the shelf all covered up with sage, catnip and saffron for four weeks, if I remember rightly. One day Solomon David B. Agag, —no, I mean Agag Solomon David B. says to me, says he, father, says he, father, I have concluded to take the steers. Aunt Hanner has writ that I may have 'em at the price I offered when I was up there, and mother said she would like to go up with me, if you hain't no objections, to look after the apple-sarse.

Well, they hitched up old Dobbin and went. While they were gone, I thought it would be a good time to finish those nine pages. I read them all and then found that somehow I lost the connection. So I just commenced at the beginnin' and read the pesky thing clear through to the end,—and now I ain't goin' to have anything more to do with it, bein' satisfied that it was no book for an orthodox church member. Such books as them lead to infidelity," said the deacon.

I asked him "what he was going to do with the book now he was through reading it."

He replied that he expected "that pesky pedler will be back in the neighborhood in a few days to see a gal he was hankering after, and I am agoin' to make him take it back; so he will have to give me back the money he swindled me out of—four dollars in greenbacks."

"If the pedler never makes his appearance in these parts, what will you do with the book then?" I inquired.

The deacon scratched his head for about five minutes, and replied that he "supposed that he should have to lose it, or sell it at a sacrifice. I would sell it for less than I gave, but then, there ain't no one that would want it, and perhaps it would be wicked for me to sell it, it might fall into some young man's hands and be the ruination of him. It's a powerful wicked book."

"How much will you take for it, deacon?"

"I declare, you wouldn't buy such a book, would you, knowing its contents?"

"Yes, I am going to buy it, deacon, name your price."

The deacon hemmed, coughed and spit, looked in all directions, then commenced a long-winded discourse on profane books in general, and then wound up his discourse with the advice to me not to buy the New Pilgrim's Progress, "cause it was not written by John Bunyan. It's by a fellow that calls hisself Mark Twain, you see."

I told him that was just the reason why I wanted to buy it.

His eyes opened wide and stared at me like those of an owl. After I told him three times that I would buy the book, he said he would let me have it for $3.75. He was willing to sacrifice a quarter if I would let him come to my house and read it sometimes, "cause you see I am going to write and caution the public one of those days. Now I have kinder lost the connection."

I paid him $3.75, and promised him he should have the loan of it any time he wished.

He then put it into my hand wound up in six newspapers, "The Innocents Abroad, or the New Pilgrim's Progress."

I read it through twice and was very much pleased with the manner in which Mark Twain had written concerning the voyage of the Quaker City. He alone, save three, of all the tourists I have ever known, has returned to the United States without Europe in his belly, or the Holy Land on the brain. Common-sense people should club together and give him a pension for showing up the Grimeses.

The deacon has read the book through twice since I bought it. He says one of those days he is going to expose its fallacies to the public. Some of us who know the deacon think that his forthcoming criticism on Mark Twain will be as great a piece of headwork as that of Dr. My Gosh on Emerson, Goethe and Carlyle. One thing is in the deacon's favor—he has read thoroughly his author, first-handed; and if he don't lose the connection and fill his paper full of quotations from scripture, although altogether irrelevant to the subject—as some orthodox writers do,—if he sticks to his subject, Mark Twain's "New Pilgrim's Progress," the deacon will then, we presume, produce as wonderful a piece of criticism as some English and American theologians have on German rationalism and the twelve apostles of heresy.

HARD TO SUIT.

[By Col. Higginson, in the N. Y. National Standard.]

Everybody remembers the story of the sergeant who flogged the soldier, and who complained that whether he struck high or low, he found it equally impossible to give satisfaction. It is just as hopeless an effort, when those who attack existing prejudices attempt to propitiate those who defend those things.

Theodore Parker, for instance, called himself a Christian, and was the object of unsparing denunciation for the presumption. But when Francis Abbot, holding essentially the same views, turns round and says, "very well, then, I will not call myself a Christian," he is reproached more severely than his predecessor.

We see the same inconsistency in the attacks now being made upon the Rev. J. L. Hatch for distributing tracts in Boston. We have constantly been told by the clergy, "Free religion has no zeal, raises no money, sends no colporteurs, distributes no tracts." "What can be the consistency of men who make so little effort to advance their doctrines?" Moved by such appeals a member of the "Free Religious Association" takes up his position at the doors of the "Young Men's Christian Association," and offers a radical tract to every one who goes in or out. The indignant members appeal to the janitor, to the "American Unitarian Association," and possibly to the Chief of Police. The case is hopeless, for it is only an imitation of what the "Young Men's Christian Association," or those who think with them, have done at every meeting of the "Free Religious Association." But it shows the hopeless difficulty of dealing with men who will neither consent to be let alone nor to be molested,—calling us indifferent if we do not attack them, and insolent if we do.

The writer is not a very ardent propagandist, though he becomes more so when he reads such things. He has never seen Mr. Hatch's tracts, nor does he know in what spirit that gentleman administers them. But logic is logic, and he humbly submits that it must be right either to claim the name of Christian or to disclaim it,—one or the other. It must be right either to urge one's opinions or to keep them to one's self.

DISTRIBUTION OF LIBERAL TRACTS.

[We are pleased to see this fair and just paragraph in the columns of Zion's Herald, the Methodist paper in Boston. It is a mistake, however, about the police, who refused to interfere.]

Rev. Mr. Hatch, a Unitarian clergyman, has been accustomed to distribute tracts at the doors of the evangelical meetings. He has been forbidden by the police. We regret this. He has a right to offer his tracts at any door. They will do no harm. If he is forbidden, so may any tract distributor be on his beat. They cannot stand on the Common, if not on the side-walk before the Temple. We know of no other person who stands at the doors of congregations as he does, that they do not agree with, and offer tracts of a contrary sort. The Universalist is mistaken, we think, in the declaration, that—

"For years, the emissaries of the Tract House have haunted heterodox places of worship, thrusting into the faces of unoffending people tracts, the very titles of which were an insult to those who were expected to take them."

If so, we condemn it heartily. But it is difficult to draw the exact line between duty and annoyance; it ought to be left to the distributors and their friends, and to common sense, and not to the police.

WHY FARMERS' SONS DISLIKE FARMING.

[From the American Farm Journal.]

Farmers complain that their sons do not take to the profession of their fathers kindly, but that a very large per cent. of them drift into the cities, and follow other occupations. This is true, and the fault is, in half the cases, with the farmers themselves. The reason for this is that the American farmer is too much possessed with the spirit of money-getting to make farm life pleasant. We know of thousands, who have broad acres, immense houses, cattle, sheep and swine, and who, in addition to these treasures, have their thousands and tens of thousands in government bonds, or in mortgages, who live in a style far inferior to that of the humblest mechanic in the towns. Their houses are built not to gratify taste, or to yield pleasure to their inmates, but solely with an eye to convenience; the floors are uncarpeted, the windows are shadeless, there are no books, no papers save one for market reports, no good cheery furniture, no piano or melodeon, no nothing to make life pleasant. Outside the same barren, hard appearance is manifest. Flowers are tabooed, there are no ornamental trees, the barn is as severe in style as rigid economy can make it, in short everything is sacrificed to the one idea—profit.

Is it any wonder that the boy born and reared amid such surroundings desires something better as soon as he discovers that there is something better? Is it any wonder that, seeing in towns luxuries, beauty and taste, he fancies that mercantile or professional pursuits must be better to afford these things? Is it any wonder that after living a month among pleasant things he should imbibe a distaste to the farm of his father, and the hard, close life led upon it?

We wish to be understood. The farmer who has debt on his hands, or whose farm lacks necessary improvements, has no business with any of this. Much better bare floors and walls than mortgages. But in middle life, when the farm is paid for, and stocked, when there is money at interest, and the chances for failure have all been passed, the farmer who does not add to his house all these things is foolish indeed. There should be in every such farmhouse as good furniture, as good carpets, as good a piano, and as good a library as any townsman worth an equal amount possesses; the sons and daughters should be as well educated, not that they may leave the farm, but that they may make farm life pleasant and happy.

There should be just as good society, and as much of it, in the country as in the town. The social instincts inherent in all should be cultivated, there should be music, there should be reading, there should be discussions, in short whatever men of means find to amuse and improve themselves in town, men of means in the country should find and practise.

When all this is done, farmers' sons will seldom leave the noblest of all professions, for with these additions farming is the most pleasant life that can be led; and for the same reason farmers' daughters will prefer to marry farmers' sons, but not till then.

An English judge once addressed a criminal, who had been sentenced to death for uttering a one-pound note, in this wise: "I trust that through the merits and mediation of our Blessed Redeemer you may there experience that mercy which a due regard to the credit of the paper currency of the country forbids you to hope for here."

THE EXCOMMUNICATION OF SPINOZA.

[From Lewes' "Biographical History of Philosophy," pp. 457—460.]

The education of the Jews was almost exclusively religious, the Old Testament and the Talmud forming their principal studies. Spinoza entered into them with a fanatical zeal, which, backed as it was by remarkable penetration and subtlety, won the admiration of the Chief Rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira, who became his guide and instructor. Great indeed were the hopes entertained of this youth, who at fourteen rivalled almost all the doctors in the exactitude and extent of his biblical knowledge. But these hopes were turned to fears, when they saw that young and pertinacious spirit pursue his undaunted inquiries into whatever region they conducted him, and found him putting difficulties to them which they, Rabbins and philosophers, were unable to solve.

Spinoza was to be deterred neither by threats nor by sophistifications. He found in the Old Testament no mention of the doctrine of immortality: there was complete silence on the point. He made no secret of his opinions; and two of his school-fellows, irritated at his intellectual superiority, or else anxious to curry favor with the Rabbins, reported his heresy with the usual fertility of exaggeration. Summoned to appear before the Synagogue, he obeyed with a gay carelessness, conscious of his innocence. His judges, finding him obstinate in his opinions, threatened him with excommunication; he answered with a sneer. Morteira, informed of the danger, hastened to confront his rebellious pupil; but Spinoza remained as untouched by his rhetoric as he was unconvinced by his arguments. Enraged at this failure, Morteira took a higher tone, and threatened him with excommunication unless he at once retracted. His pupil was irritated, and replied in sarcasms. The Rabbi then impetuously broke up the Assembly, and vowed "only to return with the thunder-bolt in his hand."

In anticipation of the threatened excommunication, Spinoza wisely withdrew himself from the Synagogue—a step which profoundly satisfied his enemies, as he thereby rendered futile all intimidations which had been employed against him, particularly the otherwise terrible excommunication; for what terror could such a sentence inspire in one who voluntarily absented himself from the society which pretended to exclude him? Dreading his ability, and the force of his example, the Synagogue made him an offer of an annual pension of a thousand florins, if he would only consent to be silent, and assist from time to time at their ceremonies. Spinoza, indignant at such an attempt to palter with conscience, refused it with scorn. One evening, as he was coming out of the theatre, where he had been relaxing his overtaken mind, he was startled by the fierce expression of a dark face thrust eagerly before him. The glare of blood-thirsty fanaticism arrested him; a knife gleamed in the air, and he had barely time to parry the blow. It fell upon his chest, but, fortunately deadened in its force, only tore his coat. The assassin escaped. Spinoza walked home thoughtful.

The day of excommunication at length arrived; and a vast concourse of Jews assembled to witness the awful ceremony. It began by the solemn lighting of a quantity of black wax candles, and by opening the tabernacle wherein were deposited the Books of the Law of Moses. Thus were the dim imaginations of the faithful prepared for all the horror of the same.

Morteira, the ancient friend and master, now the fiercest enemy of the condemned, was to order the execution of the sentence. He stood there, pained, but implacable; the people fixed their eager eyes upon him. High above, the chanter rose and chanted forth, in loud, ingubrious tones, the words of execration; while from the opposite side another mingled with these curses the thrilling sounds of the trumpet; and now the black candles were reversed, and were made to melt, drop by drop, into a huge tub filled with blood. This spectacle—a symbol of the most terrible faith—made the whole assembly shudder; and when the final Anathema Maranatha! were uttered, and the lights all suddenly immersed in the blood, a cry of religious horror and execration burst from all; and in that solemn darkness, and to those solemn curses, they shouted Amen, Amen!

Thus was the young truth-seeker expelled from his community, his friends and relations forbidden to hold intercourse with him.

THE COW TREE.—"Among the many curious phenomena which presented themselves to me in the course of my travels," says Humboldt, "I confess there were few by which my imagination was so powerfully affected as by the cow-tree. On the parched side of a rock on the mountains of Venezuela grows a tree with dry and leathery foliage, its large woody roots scarcely penetrating into the ground. For several months in the year its leaves are not moistened by a shower; its branches look as if they were dead or withered; but when the trunk is bored, a bland and nourishing milk flows from it. It is at sunrise that the vegetable fountain flows most freely. At that time the blacks and natives are seen coming from all parts, provided with large bowls to receive the milk, which grows yellow and thickens at its surface. Some empty their vessels on the spot, while others carry them to their children. One imagines he sees the family of a shepherd who is distributing the milk of his flock."

"Our mothers, the only faithful tenders who never misplaced a switch," is a toast said to have been offered at a railway banquet.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"If I could afford it, I should be glad to have two copies of THE INDEX. I give away all I receive, hoping you may gain subscribers thereby. You may judge that I like THE INDEX, when it is said that the only religious position I ever occupied was the one you advocate as 'Free Religion.' 'Spirit' communion is a fact to me, because my senses detect the presence of the Invisibles, but I cannot make a 'Religion' out of that fact. My religious belief has not changed a hair's breadth since I heard of Spiritualism, though I have been a 'medium' for seven years. Those Spiritualists who are affected by a surplus of feelings, sentiments and 'impressions' may and probably will, for a time, think or rather agree with Mrs. Cora Tappan. But not so with the reasoning ones. They will appreciate and welcome Free Religion at once, and the rest will follow when they realize the necessity of protecting Free Thought from the aggressions of evangelical Authority by a strong organization.

Please inform me through THE INDEX (if you can) at what age of the Christian church polygamy was forbidden. I do not often trouble an editor, and you will excuse these few hasty words."

—"I like your paper very much, and read it with a great deal of interest; for though I take little part in the great affairs of this world, yet I take great interest in this matter of free religion. I was much interested in your remarks on annihilation, and can agree with you exactly. It makes no difference with this present life whether we are to live hereafter or not. Truth and goodness are paying commodities to invest in, even in this world. If there is another, I shall be willing to share it with kindred spirits, but I prefer annihilation to an orthodox heaven, not to mention the dreadful hell which I shall surely come to if orthodoxy is true, for I cannot believe in Christ as my Savior. I must work out my own salvation with such help as I may get incidentally from others; and I am willing to do so, fully believing that whatever is in store for humanity in the future, I shall get my share according to deeds done in the body.

For the great untied future I have no fears, believing that God is good, and that 'whatever is, is right.'"

—"I am aware that I am late in the renewal of my subscription for THE INDEX, but I assure you that I have no thought of dispensing with its valuable services. I am a Spiritualist, but feel the strongest interest in those efforts being put forth to inculcate religion divested of superstition in earth-life; and in these great efforts I believe that the free and noble thoughts expressed through your paper are performing an important part. I should be very glad to send you the names of some new subscribers, but am not able to do so at present, but will present its claims whenever I have an opportunity."

—"The discussions on immortality in THE INDEX are good. I see in the last No., some one talks of the soul or mind as subordinate to the brain. All through the universe spirit dominates over matter, and the ethereal and permanent forces shape and change the material forms.

You talk of enlarging THE INDEX. Don't get it too large. Its breadth of spirit and thought compensates amply for a bed-blanket sheet of platitudes."

FAR AWAY.

From the brown and dripping and weedy rocks,
Battered and worn with the waves' wild shocks,
Like a gull that sweeps with pinion free,
Fly, O my soul, o'er the sea—
Far, far away!

From the damps and mists of the darkened vale,
Cold with the rush of the evening gale,
Speed thee, O soul, to the golden sky,
Into the sunset fly—
Far, far away!

From the glare of lamps and roar of the street,
Clatter of wheels and tongues and feet,
O my soul, from human strifes and jars,
Fly to the silent stars—
Far, far away!

From the weary prison, of toil and pain,
Hunger of heart and waste of brain,
Flutter forth, O my soul, with broken bond,
Fly to the calm Beyond—
Far, far away!

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

"RADICAL CHRISTIANITY."

Rev. Edward C. Towne has issued a prospectus announcing the publication of a "new Monthly Review of Religious and Humane Questions, and of Literature," to be called The Examiner. Leading features of the magazine will be—

1. A novel, entitled Crazy Chicago, a study in fiction of the insanities of enterprise and liberty in the Great West.

2. Scholarly and thoughtful essays. "Who made the Bible?" and "Theodore Parker and Christian Fellowship" will appear in the first number.

3. Translations of the best articles from French and German sources. The first number will contain—"The History of the Devil," by Albert Reville, a well-known liberal writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes.

4. Short articles and paragraphs of fact, thought and criticism. Great pains will be taken with this department.

5. Thorough articles on books, home and foreign, new, recent and standard, with special reference to studious and scholarly readers; to religious and humane questions; and to the wants of collectors of choice libraries.

The Examiner will be stereotyped and contain not less than ninety-six closely printed pages. Published by the Western News Co., Chicago. First number to appear October 1. Price $4.00 a year; $1.25 for three months; single numbers $0.50. The editor (to whom all communications must be sent) may be addressed either at his residence, Winnetka, Illinois, or at his place of business, 41 Madison St., Chicago.

In short, The Examiner proposes to be "an organ of RADICAL CHRISTIANITY," "an organ of FREE RELIGION, viewed as the Truth of Christian Revelation stripped of unessential opinion and tradition and equally antagonistic to all denial of Christianity and to all identification of it with existing forms of creed and church." "It will expound and contend for CHRISTIAN RELIGION, as the TRUTH was in Christ's teaching, and sharply distinguished from the dogmas and customs which go under the name of 'The Christian Religion.'" The editor appeals to all friends of his enterprise, thus explained, to favor him with their subscriptions and with voluntary contributions; and we cannot help adding that we hope he will receive both with unstinted hand. We have been personally acquainted with Mr. Towne for several years, and know him to be an able, scholarly, brave, sincere, and earnest man. The position he takes with regard to Christianity he will undoubtedly defend with great vigor and sound learning; and though we probably shall have frequent cause to criticize it from our own extreme and more radical position, we are very glad that an intellectual and deeply earnest believer in Christianity will boldly face the great questions which are dodged in such cowardly fashion by the organs of Unitarianism. Whether the establishment of The Examiner will help or hurt THE INDEX, we know little and care less; it is sufficient for us that the truth will gain by whatever shall excite thought and provoke discussion. A defence of radical ideas within the lines of Christian fellowship will doubtless enlist the sympathies of a larger number of minds, in the present transitional period of religious thought, than does our own advocacy of them from outside of Christianity. But the discussion of the general subject can scarcely fail to make clearer to the public that profoundly important distinction between the universal and the specialelements of Christianity which we have pointed out in our "Fifty Affirmations," and which we think Mr. Towne cannot have sufficiently considered. Be this as it may, however, we hold out our hand in heartiest and sincerest welcome to our old friend and comrade, and greet his new enterprise with our warmest wishes for its success.

THE New York Jewish Times, of Aug. 19, has a noble editorial in reply to a captious Jew of Mobile, who wrote indignantly censuring the Times for its sympathy with Germany in the war, and reminding it of various grievances suffered by the Jews at the hands of the Prussian government. It says:—

"The Jew ceases where the citizen begins; the State knows neither Jew nor Christian; it knows the citizen. . . . When at the outbreak of the war between Germany and France, in recording the fact, we claimed for Germany the championship of civilization, it never came to our mind to inquire, how did she and does she treat the Jews; this is a matter altogether indifferent and foreign to the subject, and those who are not capable of rising above the level of individuality cannot form an opinion that would be of value. . . . Nationally and politically we are no longer Jews; we are either Germans, Frenchmen, Russians, Americans, as the case may be, and we must learn to look at questions in which mankind at large are concerned, not as Jews, but as co-workers in the great cause of humanity."

Such sentiments as these are full of promise for the future of the world. When the Jews thus sink the pride of their ancient race in the consciousness of a common citizenship and common humanity, they become the superiors and instructors of the Christians, who still superciliously look down upon them as half-beathens. They show the large cosmopolitan spirit which will yet abolish the peculiarities of Judaism and Christianity alike, and unite all men in the religion of universal freedom and justice, truth and love.

WE are indebted to Messrs. Prang & Co., of Boston, for a beautiful chromo-lithograph of Senator Revels, executed after an oil painting by Kaufmann. That it is true to life, we have the testimony of Frederick Douglass, who says:—"It strikes me as a faithful representation of the man." Other gentlemen, also, who are personally acquainted with Mr. Revels, give us assurances to the same effect. The expression of the face is that of an able and honest man. The colored people may well be proud to hang on their walls the picture of one who is a living proof that the stigma of political disability no longer cleaves to their race. We hope that the enterprising and liberal firm who have given this portrait to the public will double the favor by publishing a similar portrait of Douglass. Official position, after all, is not so strong a claim to the honor as individual ability, worth, and services; and there are thousands who would be glad to possess a good likeness of the man who has toiled so generously for the emancipation and enfranchisement of his brothers in bondage.

THE first number of the American Farm Journal, a new illustrated monthly published by Miller, Locke & Co., of Toledo, is a sixteen-page paper well printed on good stock, and makes a fine appearance. Its object is "to furnish the farmers of the country with a first-class paper, devoted specially to their interests, at so low a price that they can all afford to take it, and not one of them who consults his interests can afford to be without it." To read its articles is enough to make one in love with agriculture; and we should be tempted to drop the editorial pen and shears for hoe and rake, if we did not remember that THE INDEX also is a farmer, and hopes to see a harvest from the seed it scatters broadcast. The editorial we copy from the Farm Journal on a previous page, if a fair indication of what the paper will be, shows that strong sense and wise counsel will abound in its columns. Terms—75 cents per annum for single subscriptions.

A NEW use has been discovered at Melbourne, Australia, for Prof. Huxley's well-known speculations, namely, the securing of customers at a restaurant, as appears from the following advertisement:—

Huxley's celebrated Essay on this subject is lecture on daily, by who has made the matter a life study. It is also illustrated daily at his tables, where the "physical basis" can be laid in from 11 to 3, in the best cooked and most varied

If anything is offensive to a person of decent habits, it is the reception of enclosed postage stamps, intended for subsequent use, and yet stuck to a letter with the sender's own saliva. It is bad enough to attach them even by the corner in this way; but to attach them by the whole under-surface is disgusting. Why not fold them neatly in a slip of paper?

A PRAYER.

O God, more light! I cannot see my way;
The hope I held is fading from my sight,
And all is darkness where there once was day;
O Father, give thy erring child more light.

I know the spirits that around me cling
Are evil, and my soul leaps up in fight;
But still their demon voices through me ring,
E'en while I pray unto thee here to-night.

If I could find, if I could tread the path,
If I could see but once what is the right,
Then with fresh courage could I brave the wrath
Of these fierce fiends, and put them all to flight.

O Father, show to me that heavenly way,
That I may ever strive to walk aright;
For I am willing, and in soul I pray
For light, O Father, for thy blessed light.

ORGANIZATION.

EDITOR INDEX:—Will you pardon me for offering something more on the subject of organization?

Is it not time, as you remarked in the last INDEX, "for liberals to throw off their short-sighted indifference, come down from the clouds, and put their shoulders to the wheel of practical work?" And if that time has come, should not the question of organization be first in order? In nearly every town, from three to five persons, at least, can be found who fearlessly advocate the cause of Free Religion. To these persons allow me to make a few suggestions.

Friends of free thought, you doubtless find yourselves in your respective localities in a small minority, and often feel that you are fighting the battle of progress nearly alone. At times you become discouraged, and notwithstanding you have "learned to labor," you find it far more difficult to "learn to wait," for beneficial results. Now what you need to sustain, strengthen, and encourage you, is the fraternal co-operation of the thousands scattered all over this country who are in sympathy with your views. And to be able to give and to receive that co-operation we must organize. But that organization must be of the simplest kind, one that will place no yoke upon the neck of its members, but leave all as free as the air they breathe.

For this organization large numbers are not requisite. The three or five in each town are sufficient. Let us commence the work in this wise.

Reader, speak to your liberal friends of both sexes in your city or town, and invite them to meet at your office, shop, or parlor next Saturday evening, September 10, at 7½ o'clock, to organize a "Radical Club," (or such other name as you may choose to give the new organization.) Adopt the most simple articles of association, and forward the name of your society to W. J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association, at New Bedford, Mass., and also to THE INDEX for publication. Besides, be sure and have your proceedings published in your own town or city papers.

When you get together, organize, if not more than three are present; for be assured that after you have commenced the work, others will fall in line. Free thought is abroad in the land, and many of your neighbors, of whom you do not dream, are waiting for you to lead the way for them to follow. The times are ripe for this forward movement.

The correspondent of the Independent who wrote the article entitled "A Blighted Life," is but one of the many to be found in every community who feel that "the deepest and most remediless injury that one man can inflict upon another in this world" has been inflicted in the name of Christianity; and they are waiting for the opportune moment to declare their spiritual independence. To these "spirits in prison" you owe this immediate action.

Then we have noble men who are waiting to preach the new gospel to the world, and these little associations will guide their steps from one portion of the country to another; and each will form a nucleus around which the friends of progress can gather to listen to their earnest words of truth. And after hundreds of these organizations are formed, it will devolve upon our Frothinghams, our Higginsons, our Abbots, our Dentons, our Mrs. Stantons, our Lucy Stones, our Mrs. Howes, and others who are able to teach the people, to go forth from one society to another, and give such instruction as the infinite Spirit shall vouchsafe to them.

Then once a year each one of these clubs should send their ablest members to a State association, where plans for united action should be devised. If thought best, these State societies could send representatives to a United States association. This, of course, is an after-consideration.

But (to close this communication) let us make the experiment on the 10th of this month, and see what will come of it. Do not be select in your invitations. Invite all (of both sexes) who love humanity and are in favor of spiritual freedom, whether called Christian, Jew, Pagan, Spiritualist, or Infidel; and adopt no creed, no infallible authority outside of the soul.

I hope all liberal papers, who feel so disposed, will insert the substance of this call for organization.

H. L. GREEN.

[The above communication came to hand just as the last INDEX was going to press; and we have therefore taken the liberty of putting the date of the projected meetings a week later than was written. It is needless to say that we entirely sympathize with the general plan above proposed, so far as local organization is concerned. We are not anxious for anything further at present, and do not desire at any time what might grow into a new sect. What is needed is local enlightenment all over the country, and this can be best promoted by independent local clubs.—ED.]

MUSINGS.

I have never wondered at all that the men of olden times had visions and revelations, that they talked with angels and saw God. My only wonder is that we do not to-day; that for us, too, the trees are not filled with "close-pressed bosoms of subsiding nymphs," and the veil between heaven and earth is not withdrawn or rent. Who can tell how much it sweetened life, and drew it up from the dusty common-place? Since the old Greeks went accompanied by gods, it is no wonder that they gave us such visions of beauty or that the world still counts them among her treasures. Is it strange that Isaiah spoke with a tongue of flame, when the very kings of the dead came up to greet him, and told him the secrets of their prison-house?

When I lie down on the grass and all about me is mystery and beauty, all "questions" and "causes" are forgotten in the rhythm of Nature, whose full orchestra has room for every note, resolving discords into harmony. All the strivings that engross our day become irrelevant, and the individual soul which is larger than its conditions tries to face its destiny. Is it life or death, mortality or immortality? Does God live, and hold in his right hand "long life, even forever and ever?" Struggling with doubt where to doubt puts out the sun, tortured with the sense of unfulfilled being that craves eternity for growth and expression, I marvel that some angel from the right hand of God, whose wings still quiver with the breath of His Being, does not come down to me, and minister to my hunger. Is it less real than that of the Israelites, to whom He gave manna? I half expect the blue sky to open, and let me see what lies beyond. I wonder God does not speak as in the shady walks of Eden, before He sought for Adam and he was ashamed and hid himself.

Are our purple hills, wet with dew and bright with flowers, lit by the sun and the moon, less beautiful than those old hills of Paradise, where the angels came down like sudden benedictions and talked with the children of men? Said a little boy to me once, looking at the sunset, "I see the angels there sitting in a row." Behind the beauty and the glory I too want to see the angels; and the grand cold law of forces and of motion, beautiful as a poet's dream and more wonderful, cannot fill that place. Like the old Sphinx in the desert, our destiny faces us—forever an enigma. Its base is hid; we know not whence we come; and though the desert wind may fling the sand into its eyes, they never wink or close, but look off into the distance. What do they see there? Some rapture of surprise that shall transfigure us, when the fiery chariot bears us hence like Elijah? Some gradual, dewy growth, like flowers that push their way up through the clay and find the sun? Under our laughter far too deep for tears, the old question repeats itself. While we struggle, aspire, and agonize, does that life of the immortals live itself and we not know it? Can such music be within the Universe and we not hear it? Walled in with silence and with mystery, could no note come down to reassure and bless us?

Going out from home, alone in a strange land, his head pillowed on a stone, the vision came to Jacob. Do hard duties bring such recompense? It was to shepherds, watching their flocks, that the stars appeared of old and the angels sang. Always in quiet places, pursuing often some homely task, the winged vision overtook them, as fate overtakes all. Are these the conditions? In a life contemplative and still, would the revelation be ours too? If we link our life to Nature's, and learn her stillness, will she like a mother unravel for us the mystery of her days and nights, "which hedge in time from the eternities?" But our modern life is busy with its plans; it is eager in its pursuits. The stars might clap their hands together, and the harmony of the spheres grow audible, and none stop to listen. In those old days there was time for quiet; among the shepherds who lived a thousand years, there was leisure for dreams. The world was young then, and in childhood our years are centuries. No mystery is strange where all is mystery,—no wonder heavy-freighted. But the world is past its childhood; the effervescence of its youth is come. Restless waves of tumultuous life beating about to find a shore: tides of a troubled sea whose moon has not yet risen. What are we but grapes crushed in the wine-press,—the young wine bubbling, fermenting, eddying, restless with the wonder of its new existence? Effervescence must come first, that all scum may rise to the top, and the depths grow rich and pure. Shall some angel be sent to stop it? We know that the prudent husbandman stands by to bottle his precious vintage. Do you think that Death will spill God's costly wine?

To this unappetized hunger to know tidings of our future, one man ministered with so sure a faith and so tender an insight, that the world will never cease to be his debtor. Though every word of his had perished, all men are greater in knowing how high a man may grow, how deep a fountain one soul may be to the thirsty. His faith in man's hereafter is a gift of beauty unsurpassed. His word was so great that few to-day conceive it. "I and my Father are one?" The Divine and human nature are akin, all spiritual life is of the same essence. Put under foot your dogmas, and enter into your inheritance. If we sometimes infuse our own modern thought into his words, yet how large a mould must that have been which, though made eighteen hundred years ago, can yet contain it?

Still walking up and down by the sea of Galilee, where the multitude came to him of old and were helped, mingling his words with the murmur of its waters,—this picture will never die. But the sea of Galilee is leagues away, the shores we tread are full of alien life, and the multitudes that come to us to-day speak other tongues. We cannot live on stories of the past. We want the glory of to-day, its truth, its revelation. No last year's sun can ripen this year's corn.

You have preached me Christ's religion long enough; now tell me yours. What vision have you seen? Where has your soul touched the Infinite, and what path led to it? Was it joy or pain, renunciation or possession? When the call came to you, did you straightway leave your fishing, your business, your receiving of custom, and obey it? Like Samuel, did you answer—"Lord, here am I?" It is naught to me that eighteen hundred years ago gods spoke with men, if they keep unbroken silence now. The divine old instincts of the world are always right. I will listen only to those who have been on the mount of transfiguration, whose faces shine with the brightness of its glory. I shall so far believe in heaven, when you tell me you have been there.

From those who walk the ramparts of the city walls, the solemn Bible question is asked again by the full heart of the world—"Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?" Have you no answer but the old mysterious words—"The morning cometh and also the night. If ye will inquire, inquire ye. Return, come." If, like the old shepherds, you have not slept but watched, have you had no visions? Have no starry bonfires been lit for you on the distant heavenly hills? What angels crowded there to send messages to men? We are "looking to the hills from whence cometh our help."

SECTS IN MEDICINE.

A Second Letter to the New Hampshire Homeopathic Medical Society.

BY CARL H. HORSCH.

GENTLEMEN:—The resolutions adopted by your society on the 15th of June, 1870, have been transmitted to me by your Secretary in accordance with your instructions, and they read as follows:—

WHEREAS, A letter has been addressed to the society by Dr. C. H. Horsch of Dover, taking exception to the title of "Homeopathic" and advising that the society disclaim its distinctive features, and invite all to unite in an organization "who have acquired the right to claim the name of physician without regard to difference of treatment, etc.," thus virtually denying the truth of Homeopathy, and admitting that our system is based upon false assumptions and untenable grounds; therefore be it

Resolved, That we were never more fully convinced than now of the truth of "Similia Similibus Curantur;" and, believing it to be the only scientific law that has yet been adduced to govern the administration of remedial agents, we propose to rigidly adhere to the peculiar views of the Homeopathic School, believing that the future will continue to abundantly demonstrate the superiority of that system of medical practice over all others.

Resolved, That while mongrel medical organizations, such as have been proposed to our society in this instance, may do for those who have not fully embraced the truths of Homeopathy, we respectfully decline to be a partner to any such absurd and impracticable scheme, being persuaded that the interests of humanity and science alike would be compromised and endangered by such action.

In my former letter I do not "deny the truth" of any system in the practice of medicine; I do most sincerely acknowledge that all of them aim at truth and science. But if the member of your society who framed those resolutions, and the members who adopted them, claim to be "fully convinced of the truth of 'Similia Similibus Curantur,'"—and "believe it to be the only scientific law that has yet been adduced to govern the administration of remedial agents," I am forced to admit that such manifestoes are based upon false assumptions and untenable grounds, and not upon science. The followers of the law—"Contraria Contrariis Curantur"—have just as much claim to call it "the only scientific law," and can give a more plausible explanation than the followers of "Similia Similibus Curantur." But if we search for a real, scientific, logical demonstration of the truth of the one law, which shall prove the other law to be false, what has the earnest and honest investigator found thus far? Nothing but conjectures backed by empty words. Credulity has prevailed in this investigation rather than science.

How much members of medical societies are fettered by society notions! That suffering humanity is compromised by such schemes, will be shown by the following narrative. A medical practitioner related to a gentleman that he used cold water in a certain case, and stated that he had a splendid result. When asked why he did not follow it up and use it in other cases, he said: "I did not dare to." He belonged to a Medical Society which was not a Hydropathic Society, therefore he did not dare to benefit his patients with hydropathic treatment. Romanism would not acknowledge or appreciate anything good if it came from Protestantism. But I am sorry to say the same is also true of sects in medicine.

If a patient is suffering from pain, and infinitesimal doses will not relieve him, is it not absurd and even cruel to refrain from giving a dose of Morphia, which does relieve certain pains, provided it is a dapted to the case. Do you, gentlemen, "rigidly adhere to the peculiar views of Homœopathy in such cases?"

It is my opinion, however, that Homœopathy, Isopathy, Hydropathy and other mild forms and systems of treatment ought to be investigated by medical societies and individual physicians as much as possible, and without prejudice. If we compare the terrestrial and atmospheric conditions of the vegetable and animal life of past ages with the conditions of the present age, we find changes which may be considered as among the causes why modes of medical treatment have changed. The depleting system which was practised one hundred years ago when inflammatory diseases prevailed, would not be adapted to men of the present day.

All modest, rational men and women search for the truth, reason and science being their guide; they have one universal aim for the good of humanity. But whether it is probable that a medical society would become "a mongrel medical organization," if the members should base their treatment on scientific principles, and rationally adapt it to the present state of science, we leave it to such men and women to decide. Can the interests of humanity and science alike be compromised or endangered by scientific principles? "The interests of humanity and science alike" are certainly compromised and endangered by sectarian speculations and assumptions, and the truth is thereby sacrificed.

It seems to me that, if a system of medicine were in reality so harmonious as the above singular resolutions seem to imply, we should not find among its adherents sectarianism or want of harmony; but have we not already two sects among the Homœopaths, those who give low and those who give high potencies? And when we consider those who give mother tinctures, and the extreme alternatists, where would Hahnemann, or where do his followers find the real system which reconciles or includes these conflicting schools of Homœopathy? You may believe what you please, gentlemen; but allow me to remind you, that mere belief and positive science are two entirely different things. Where mere belief commences, positive science has reached the last step, and cannot go a line further; and while we are compelled to keep them separate, let us beware of mistaking the one for the other. Belief becomes sectarian bigotry, if it sets itself up for knowledge. But science is the enemy, not only of ignorance, but also of its twin brother, sectarianism.

DOVER, N. H., August 11, 1870.

"INFORMATION WANTED," A REPLY.

PLYMOUTH, WIS., August 21, 1870.

EDITOR INDEX:—Your correspondent, W. G., of Delavan, in this State, has asked, "Can some of your readers give me any reliable information about the problem of immortality?" He certainly asks a very important question, and one to which I have never had anything like a satisfactory reply, till within the last year.

There is no evidence of a continued state of sentiment existing after the dissolution of the body, to those who require a reason for their faith, save in the facts of Spiritualism. I do not say that these are perfectly convincing, but they come nearer to demonstrating a future existence than anything that has ever fallen before, within the reach of my observation.

Permit me to say, also, parenthetically, that I do not believe any "Radical Club" or "Free Religious Society" can hope for a permanent existence, unless it can present to its members some more reliable evidence of immortality than any of the poetical abstractions that I have read in any of their publications.

I must differ with your correspondent about the belief of annihilation not being "a very bad place." I have spent a life-time there, and will be candid enough to say that, were it possible to believe it, the orthodox doctrine of heaven and hell as taught by the representative theologians of the present day would be a more comfortable "place" than that. But I commenced this paper for the purpose of giving W. G., "as reliable information" upon the subject he inquires about as I am able.

He is right when he says, "Those matters cannot be decided by faith, but by facts;" and that "ear and eye witnesses are alone admissible." Indeed, the facts of Spiritualism are so extraordinary that few will believe them on the affirmation of witnesses perfectly reliable on other matters. I do not ask or expect W. G. to give any more credence to my testimony than it deserves. I am not wholly unknown in this State. Your correspondent has, perhaps, voted for or against me for a public office. But I would not believe an improbable story for this alone, neither do I ask W. G. to take my word, altogether; let him examine for himself. He can witness what I have witnessed, and account for it as he can. To be brief, then, I have investigated the facts of Spiritualism, candidly and patiently. I have sat in a circle of select friends and felt hands which I knew were not human hands! I knew it because the "medium" had but two hands and they were of one size, while those I felt were of all sizes, from those of the smallest infant to those of the largest man! Then there were none in the house (my own house) but trusted and trusty friends, myself and wife and the medium. She was a young and apparently guileless woman, who was born in a distant State and knew nothing about our several histories, nor of our deceased friends, and was remarkable for nothing but frailness of body and her extraordinary mediumistic powers, which
